Currently, I know of no agricultural company that forces me to buy their product, unless DOJ might want to look at the fertilizer industry. It has the wholesale farmer and thus the retail consumer by the softest parts. Even it, though has at least some market regulation....farmers apply less if it is a money-loser. DOJ, being a government-funded agency may or probably does not realize farmers have to make money or will eventually quit the practice.

The seed industry is obviously an oligopoly vs. true competition, as is most of corporate America now. The DOJ will have to look at at least ALL the top 4 if they look at any.

The odds of the Department of Justice actually having anything to do with fairness and "justice" are so slim in comparison to what will probably be plain old dishonest politics, I suggest they focus on Wall Street or Congress: the more obvious unregulated crooks.
