Venezuela: Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS), including structure, leadership, and membership process; MAS membership cards, including description; treatment of members by authorities and society (2008-January 2015)

Research Directorate, Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada, Ottawa

1. Background

The statutes of the Movement Towards Socialism or Movement to Socialism (Movimiento al Socialismo, MAS) define the party as [translation]

a democratic organization composed of men and women struggling to be interpreters of the aspirations and needs of the workers and peasants, employees, professionals and technicians, students and the youth, medium and small producers, city and countryside entrepreneurs, the marginalized, and in general of all those who want a more just and democratic society. (MAS n.d.a, Art. 1)

The website of MAS indicates that the party was created in 1971, when it splintered from the Communist Party of Venezuela (Partido Comunista de Venezuela) due to internal conflicts regarding the position of the party towards the Soviet Union and the emergence of Eurocommunism [a "trend among European communist parties toward independence from Soviet Communist Party doctrine during the 1970s and '80s" (Encyclopædia Britannica 15 Aug. 2013)] (MAS n.d.b). In correspondence with the Research Directorate, an associate professor of sociology at the Universidad Central de Venezuela who specializes in Venezuelan politics indicated that at the time of its foundation, MAS defended the idea of a [translation] "modern left" that was critical of the Soviet system (Associate Professor 19 Jan. 2015). MAS indicates on its website that the party supported Hugo Chávez for the 1998 presidential elections, and until 2001, when it decided that the government's actions did not reflect the programs that had been presented to the country (MAS n.d.a). The Political Handbook of the World 2014 (PHW) indicates that MAS "began distancing itself from the government coalition in May 2001 in the wake of reports that the president [Hugo Chávez] was considering a declaration of emergency that would permit him to rule by decree" (2014, 1595). Five months later, according to the same source, Chávez asked MAS to leave the ruling coalition (ibid.).

Sources indicate that MAS joined the opposition movement (Associate Professor 19 Jan. 2015; PHW 2014, 1595), also known as the Democratic Unity Table (Mesa de la Unidad Democrática, MUD), before the 2010 National Assembly elections (ibid.). MUD is a coalition of 50 parties that challenged the ruling party in the 2010 and 2012 elections (ibid., 1594).

According to the Associate Professor, after MAS withdrew its support from the ruling coalition, President Chávez criticized MAS [translation] "several times" for their "'disloyalty'" (Associate Professor 19 Jan. 2015). The Associate Professor also indicated that the party has experienced [translation] "many" internal divisions between those who supported Chávez and those who did not (ibid.). In his opinion, MAS is a [translation]

"tiny" party whose influence in Venezuelan politics is "very small" (ibid.). Corroborating information on the above statements by the Associate Professor could not be found among the sources consulted by the Research Directorate within the time constraints of this Response.

Information on the geographical presence and activities of MAS could not be found among the sources consulted by the Research Directorate within the time constraints of this Response.
