REPLY IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO DISMISS NONPARTY APPELLANT'S APPEAL

Over a century ago, no less of an authority than the United States Supreme Court declared that the rule that a nonparty to a final judgment "is not entitled to appeal therefrom" was "no longer open to discussion." United States ex rel. State of Louisiana v. Boardman, 244 U.S. 397, 402 (1917) (quoting In re Leaf Tobacco Board of Trade, 222 U.S. 578, 581 (1911) (per curiam)). This Court applied this "well settled" rule, see Marino v. Ortiz, 484 U.S. 301, 304 (1988) (per curiam), to dismiss for "want of jurisdiction" a nonparty crime victim's attempted appeal from a restitution order. See United States v. Franklin, 792 F.2d 998, 999-1000 (11th Cir. 1986). Franklin's holding and reasoning compel the dismissal of this appeal.

1. ICE asserts that Franklin reserved the questions whether a nonparty could intervene at sentencing and, if intervention was denied, appeal that denial, Opp. at 14-15, but the relevance of that assertion is entirely unclear. Like the victim in Franklin, see id., ICE did not seek to intervene below, and in any event, the issues the Court reserved have no bearing on Franklin's holding that this Court lacks jurisdiction over a nonparty crime victim's post-judgment appeal of a restitution order. ICE tries to sidestep this problem by asserting that, unlike the victim in Franklin, it was a de facto intervenor below because it participated at sentencing; thus, ICE suggests, it can appeal as a result. Opp. 15. ICE is incorrect.[1/] Although a nonparty who intervenes generally obtains "the same rights of appeal from a final judgment as all

[1/] ICE's reliance on In re Siler, 571 F.3d 604, 608 (6th Cir. 2009), is misplaced, as Siler relied on civil cases, where intervention is permitted, and ignored the fact that nonparties may not intervene in a criminal case. ICE also fails to mention that Siler has since been limited to cases where the victim did not seek mandamus review. In re Acker, 596 F.3d 370, 373 (6th Cir. 2010). ICE, of course, sought mandamus review, so Siler is inapposite.

other parties," Stringfellow v. Concerned Neighbors in Action, 480 U.S. 370, 377 (1987), ICE did not intervene below. It participated at sentencing, but participation is not intervention, and its participation could not have been construed as a request to intervene because nonparties "ha[ve] no right under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to intervene." United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794, 804 (5th Cir. 1975). Instead, a nonparty district court participant is analogous to an amicus curiae, who may not appeal. See United States v. LTV Corp., 746 F.2d 51, 53 (D.C. Cir. 1984). And, even if ICE's "de facto intervenor" argument were correct, ICE likely could not maintain this appeal anyway because none of the parties in this case have appealed. In Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54 (1986), the Court held that a nonparty who intervenes in the district court cannot appeal when none of the parties has appealed, unless the intervenor itself has Article III standing, id. at 68, but, as even ICE recognizes, this Court's precedents provide reason to doubt that ICE would have standing to appeal even if it had intervened. Opp. 13 (citing United States v. Johnson, 983 F.2d 216, 219 (11th Cir. 1993) (nonparty victim-intervenor lacked Article III standing to appeal)).

2. ICE asserts that Franklin's "underpinnings" have been "called into serious question" by the CVRA. Opp. 15. Yet the text of the CVRA – which

ICE stubbornly refuses to address – allows victims to seek mandamus review, but not to appeal. Nothing in the CVRA, therefore, casts doubt on pre-CVRA decisions, like Franklin, dismissing victim appeals. Gov't Mot. to Dismiss, at 2-4, 11-18 (citing United States v. Monzel, 641 F.3d 528, 540-544 (D.C. Cir. 2011); United States v. Aguirre-Gonzalez, 597 F.3d 46, 54-55 (1st Cir. 2010); United States v. Hunter, 548 F.3d 1308, 1311 (10th Cir. 2008)).

ICE's attempts to distinguish Hunter (which the D.C. and First Circuits subsequently endorsed) are unconvincing. Opp. 18-20. First, ICE asserts that, unlike the victim in Hunter, it is appealing from the final judgment and the court's ruling denying it victim status and restitution. But regardless of what ICE is appealing, the relief it seeks – an order of restitution – would require reformation of the judgment. See 18 U.S.C. § 3663A(a)(1) (courts must order restitution "when sentencing a defendant convicted of" a qualifying offense); Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(k)(1) (written judgment "must set forth * * * the sentence"). And this concern – allowing nonparties to upset an otherwise-final judgment – led the Tenth Circuit to dismiss the victim's appeal in Hunter. 548 F.3d at 1312 ("To our knowledge, there is no precedent – nor any compelling justification – for allowing a non-party, post-judgment appeal that would reopen a defendant's sentence and affect the defendant's rights.").

Second, ICE asserts that the Tenth Circuit's decision in Hunter relied on a provision of the CVRA that precludes crime victims from seeking to reopen a final judgment except in limited circumstances, one of which is that the victim must have previously obtained a writ of mandamus. See 18 U.S.C. § 3771(d)(5)(A). ICE observes that the Tenth Circuit did not mention that Section 3771(d)(5) also states that "[t]his paragraph does not affect the victim's right to restitution as provided in title 18, United States Code," language it interprets to mean that "Congress did not want any burden placed on crime victims attempting to protect their right to restitution." Opp. 14. But whatever this sentence means,[2/] it is irrelevant here: ICE is not seeking to reopen a plea or sentence following the issuance of a writ of mandamus. (In fact, ICE's petitions for writs of mandamus were denied.)

Third, ICE contends that the Tenth Circuit's analysis in Hunter is inapplicable because it is appealing from a ruling denying it victim status, which, it claims, is not an appeal from the judgment. Semantics aside, ICE's appeal seeks to upset an otherwise-final judgment; after all, ICE is not

[2/] The most natural and likely meaning is that this sentence preserves a victim's substantive right to receive restitution even if the victim is, for some reason, unable to reopen the sentence.

seeking to appeal the denial of victim status as an end unto itself, but is instead seeking to appeal that issue because it is the gateway through which ICE can obtain restitution. ICE's proffered distinctions provide no basis for rejecting the well-reasoned decisions of other circuits.

2. Unable to counter Franklin or avoid the force of a wall of circuit precedent declaring that the CVRA did not disturb the preexisting ban on nonparty post-judgment appeals, ICE asserts that this Court should simply decline to follow Franklin. Opp. 15-16. This astonishing assertion turns the law of stare decisis on its head. "Under the prior panel precedent rule, [this Court is] bound by earlier panel holdings * * * unless and until they are overruled en banc or by the Supreme Court." United States v. Smith, 122 F.3d 1355, 1359 (11th Cir.1997) (per curiam). Franklin's holding is on point and has not been overruled; hence, it is binding on this panel in this case.[3/]

Even if Franklin was not controlling, the three cases ICE cites are inapposite. In United States v. Kones, 77 F.3d 66 (3d Cir. 1996), the court of appeals considered an appeal brought by a victim who was denied restitution. But the court did not address the significance of the victim's nonparty status on the victim's right to appeal. Nor did the court examine its own statutory authority to entertain the appeal, which the government had not contested. Instead, the court merely concluded that it had jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1291, id. at 68, but this type of "drive-by jurisdictional ruling[] * * * ha[s] no precedential effect." Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 91 (1998).[4/] Indeed, even the Third Circuit likely would decline to follow that portion of Kones in a future case where jurisdiction was contested. Cf. Chong v. District Director, INS, 264 F.3d 378, 383 (3d Cir. 2001) (rejecting the argument that the court should entertain an appeal simply because it exercised jurisdiction in another case because the jurisdictional issue was not presented in the earlier case).

[3/] ICE's observation that stare decisis is not an "inexorable command" (Opp. 15 n.9), and its related suggestion that this Court need not follow Franklin, is wide of the mark because it relies on cases addressing the Supreme Court's adherence to its own precedents. Those cases do not speak to the question here, which is whether a three-judge panel is bound by prior circuit precedent. Cases like Smith answer that question affirmatively.

As we explained, United States v. Perry, 360 F.3d 519 (6th Cir. 2004), is even more irrelevant. See Monzel, 2011 WL 1466365, at *12 (agreeing with the government's distinctions of Perry). And, even though these [4/] The fact that the government mistakenly cited Section 1291 as a source of jurisdiction in that case is beside the point because subject-matter jurisdiction cannot be conferred by the consent of the parties. See Morrison v. Allstate Indemnity Co., 228 F.3d 1255, 1261 (11th Cir. 2000).

distinctions are determinative, ICE ignores them and opts instead to emphasize the fact that Perry highlighted the "pro-victim" nature of federal restitution statutes. But in matters of statutory interpretation, of the sort at issue here, courts "must respect the compromise embodied in the words chosen by Congress"; "[i]t is not [the Court's] place simply to alter the balance struck by Congress in procedural statutes by favoring one side or the other." Mohasco Corp. v. Silver, 447 U,.S. 807, 826 (1980). In the CVRA, the balance Congress struck is clear: victims have the right to seek mandamus review but not to appeal.

The final case ICE cites is United States v. Doe, 666 F.2d 43 (4th Cir. 1980), which held that Fed. R. Evid. 412 gave a rape victim the "implicit" right to appeal an order allowing the defendant to admit evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior at trial. Id. at 46. A contrary ruling, the court held, would "frustrate[]" the purposes behind Rule 412. Id. But Doe's conclusion that Rule 412 created an implicit right of appeal is flawed because judge-promulgated rules, like the Federal Rules of Evidence, cannot "create * * * federal jurisdiction." Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 452-453 (2004); see also United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 n.13 ("[T]he Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not expand the jurisdiction of federal courts."). Nor, contrary to Doe, would a ruling that a nonparty victim cannot appeal frustrate the purposes of Rule 412 because the government, as a party to the prosecution, would retain the ability to appeal. And Doe is inapposite because it involved a pretrial appeal, not a post-judgment appeal of the sort here at issue. See Hunter, 548 F.3d at 1314 (distinguishing Doe as involving a pretrial appeal, not, as there, a post-judgment appeal).

The CVRA was intended to give victims greater participatory rights relative to criminal proceedings. One of the central means by which Congress sought to achieve that goal was to allow victims to seek immediate mandamus review of an adverse ruling. ICE contends (Opp. 12) that this mandamus remedy is a "supplemental" remedy for victims, not their "exclusive" remedy. More precisely, ICE appears to contend that victims have the option to seek either expedited mandamus review or ordinary appellate review. Even putting to one side the fact that the CVRA does not give victims the right to appeal, ICE's own actions belie its stated view. ICE invoked its statutory right to seek mandamus review, and this Court denied its petitions. Under ICE's professed view, that election should preclude an appeal – but it has not, as ICE has now appealed as well. ICE's actions thus suggest that it believes, not (as it claims) that Congress gave victims the right to choose between mandamus or appellate review, but rather, that Congress gave victims the right to seek both mandamus and appellate review. While the CVRA was designed to remedy certain imbalances in the criminal justice system's treatment of victims, ICE cites nothing to support its sweeping conclusion that Congress intended to allow victims to have two bites – i.e., mandamus review followed by appellate review – at the proverbial apple.

CONCLUSION

The parties to this prosecution have manifested their intent to bring this matter to a close and allow the judgment to become final. Having previously sought mandamus review, as permitted by law, ICE should not be permitted to proceed with its jurisdictionally-defective appeal – one that is doomed to fail anyway. Gov't Mot. to Dismiss, at 11 n.7 (noting the law-of-the-case bar to successive appellate review and ICE's inability to prove clear error). Indeed, allowing this appeal to move forward will not only consume further time and resources of the parties and the Court, but it will also prevent the judgment from truly attaining the finality that is "essential to the retributive and deterrent functions of the criminal law." Calderon v. Thompson, 523 U.S. 538, 555 (1998). This appeal should be dismissed.

REPLY IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO DISMISS NONPARTY APPELLANT'S APPEAL

Over a century ago, no less of an authority than the United States Supreme Court declared that the rule that a nonparty to a final judgment "is not entitled to appeal therefrom" was "no longer open to discussion." United States ex rel. State of Louisiana v. Boardman, 244 U.S. 397, 402 (1917) (quoting In re Leaf Tobacco Board of Trade, 222 U.S. 578, 581 (1911) (per curiam)). This Court applied this "well settled" rule, see Marino v. Ortiz, 484 U.S. 301, 304 (1988) (per curiam), to dismiss for "want of jurisdiction" a nonparty crime victim's attempted appeal from a restitution order. See United States v. Franklin, 792 F.2d 998, 999-1000 (11th Cir. 1986). Franklin's holding and reasoning compel the dismissal of this appeal.

1. ICE asserts that Franklin reserved the questions whether a nonparty could intervene at sentencing and, if intervention was denied, appeal that denial, Opp. at 14-15, but the relevance of that assertion is entirely unclear. Like the victim in Franklin, see id., ICE did not seek to intervene below, and in any event, the issues the Court reserved have no bearing on Franklin's holding that this Court lacks jurisdiction over a nonparty crime victim's post-judgment appeal of a restitution order. ICE tries to sidestep this problem by asserting that, unlike the victim in Franklin, it was a de facto intervenor below because it participated at sentencing; thus, ICE suggests, it can appeal as a result. Opp. 15. ICE is incorrect.[1/] Although a nonparty who intervenes generally obtains "the same rights of appeal from a final judgment as all

[1/] ICE's reliance on In re Siler, 571 F.3d 604, 608 (6th Cir. 2009), is misplaced, as Siler relied on civil cases, where intervention is permitted, and ignored the fact that nonparties may not intervene in a criminal case. ICE also fails to mention that Siler has since been limited to cases where the victim did not seek mandamus review. In re Acker, 596 F.3d 370, 373 (6th Cir. 2010). ICE, of course, sought mandamus review, so Siler is inapposite.

other parties," Stringfellow v. Concerned Neighbors in Action, 480 U.S. 370, 377 (1987), ICE did not intervene below. It participated at sentencing, but participation is not intervention, and its participation could not have been construed as a request to intervene because nonparties "ha[ve] no right under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to intervene." United States v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794, 804 (5th Cir. 1975). Instead, a nonparty district court participant is analogous to an amicus curiae, who may not appeal. See United States v. LTV Corp., 746 F.2d 51, 53 (D.C. Cir. 1984). And, even if ICE's "de facto intervenor" argument were correct, ICE likely could not maintain this appeal anyway because none of the parties in this case have appealed. In Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54 (1986), the Court held that a nonparty who intervenes in the district court cannot appeal when none of the parties has appealed, unless the intervenor itself has Article III standing, id. at 68, but, as even ICE recognizes, this Court's precedents provide reason to doubt that ICE would have standing to appeal even if it had intervened. Opp. 13 (citing United States v. Johnson, 983 F.2d 216, 219 (11th Cir. 1993) (nonparty victim-intervenor lacked Article III standing to appeal)).

2. ICE asserts that Franklin's "underpinnings" have been "called into serious question" by the CVRA. Opp. 15. Yet the text of the CVRA – which

ICE stubbornly refuses to address – allows victims to seek mandamus review, but not to appeal. Nothing in the CVRA, therefore, casts doubt on pre-CVRA decisions, like Franklin, dismissing victim appeals. Gov't Mot. to Dismiss, at 2-4, 11-18 (citing United States v. Monzel, 641 F.3d 528, 540-544 (D.C. Cir. 2011); United States v. Aguirre-Gonzalez, 597 F.3d 46, 54-55 (1st Cir. 2010); United States v. Hunter, 548 F.3d 1308, 1311 (10th Cir. 2008)).

ICE's attempts to distinguish Hunter (which the D.C. and First Circuits subsequently endorsed) are unconvincing. Opp. 18-20. First, ICE asserts that, unlike the victim in Hunter, it is appealing from the final judgment and the court's ruling denying it victim status and restitution. But regardless of what ICE is appealing, the relief it seeks – an order of restitution – would require reformation of the judgment. See 18 U.S.C. § 3663A(a)(1) (courts must order restitution "when sentencing a defendant convicted of" a qualifying offense); Fed. R. Crim. P. 32(k)(1) (written judgment "must set forth * * * the sentence"). And this concern – allowing nonparties to upset an otherwise-final judgment – led the Tenth Circuit to dismiss the victim's appeal in Hunter. 548 F.3d at 1312 ("To our knowledge, there is no precedent – nor any compelling justification – for allowing a non-party, post-judgment appeal that would reopen a defendant's sentence and affect the defendant's rights.").

Second, ICE asserts that the Tenth Circuit's decision in Hunter relied on a provision of the CVRA that precludes crime victims from seeking to reopen a final judgment except in limited circumstances, one of which is that the victim must have previously obtained a writ of mandamus. See 18 U.S.C. § 3771(d)(5)(A). ICE observes that the Tenth Circuit did not mention that Section 3771(d)(5) also states that "[t]his paragraph does not affect the victim's right to restitution as provided in title 18, United States Code," language it interprets to mean that "Congress did not want any burden placed on crime victims attempting to protect their right to restitution." Opp. 14. But whatever this sentence means,[2/] it is irrelevant here: ICE is not seeking to reopen a plea or sentence following the issuance of a writ of mandamus. (In fact, ICE's petitions for writs of mandamus were denied.)

Third, ICE contends that the Tenth Circuit's analysis in Hunter is inapplicable because it is appealing from a ruling denying it victim status, which, it claims, is not an appeal from the judgment. Semantics aside, ICE's appeal seeks to upset an otherwise-final judgment; after all, ICE is not seeking to appeal the denial of victim status as an end unto itself, but is instead seeking to appeal that issue because it is the gateway through which ICE can obtain restitution. ICE's proffered distinctions provide no basis for rejecting the well-reasoned decisions of other circuits.

2. Unable to counter Franklin or avoid the force of a wall of circuit precedent declaring that the CVRA did not disturb the preexisting ban on nonparty post-judgment appeals, ICE asserts that this Court should simply decline to follow Franklin. Opp. 15-16. This astonishing assertion turns the law of stare decisis on its head. "Under the prior panel precedent rule, [this Court is] bound by earlier panel holdings * * * unless and until they are overruled en banc or by the Supreme Court." United States v. Smith, 122 F.3d 1355, 1359 (11th Cir.1997) (per curiam). Franklin's holding is on point and has not been overruled; hence, it is binding on this panel in this case.[3/]

Even if Franklin was not controlling, the three cases ICE cites are inapposite. In United States v. Kones, 77 F.3d 66 (3d Cir. 1996), the court of appeals considered an appeal brought by a victim who was denied restitution. But the court did not address the significance of the victim's nonparty status on the victim's right to appeal. Nor did the court examine its own statutory authority to entertain the appeal, which the government had not contested. Instead, the court merely concluded that it had jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1291, id. at 68, but this type of "drive-by jurisdictional ruling[] * * * ha[s] no precedential effect." Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 91 (1998).[4/] Indeed, even the Third Circuit likely would decline to follow that portion of Kones in a future case where jurisdiction was contested. Cf. Chong v. District Director, INS, 264 F.3d 378, 383 (3d Cir. 2001) (rejecting the argument that the court should entertain an appeal simply because it exercised jurisdiction in another case because the jurisdictional issue was not presented in the earlier case).

[3/] ICE's observation that stare decisis is not an "inexorable command" (Opp. 15 n.9), and its related suggestion that this Court need not follow Franklin, is wide of the mark because it relies on cases addressing the Supreme Court's adherence to its own precedents. Those cases do not speak to the question here, which is whether a three-judge panel is bound by prior circuit precedent. Cases like Smith answer that question affirmatively.

As we explained, United States v. Perry, 360 F.3d 519 (6th Cir. 2004), is even more irrelevant. See Monzel, 2011 WL 1466365, at *12 (agreeing with the government's distinctions of Perry). And, even though these distinctions are determinative, ICE ignores them and opts instead to emphasize the fact that Perry highlighted the "pro-victim" nature of federal restitution statutes. But in matters of statutory interpretation, of the sort at issue here, courts "must respect the compromise embodied in the words chosen by Congress"; "[i]t is not [the Court's] place simply to alter the balance struck by Congress in procedural statutes by favoring one side or the other." Mohasco Corp. v. Silver, 447 U,.S. 807, 826 (1980). In the CVRA, the balance Congress struck is clear: victims have the right to seek mandamus review but not to appeal.

[4/] The fact that the government mistakenly cited Section 1291 as a source of jurisdiction in that case is beside the point because subject-matter jurisdiction cannot be conferred by the consent of the parties. See Morrison v. Allstate Indemnity Co., 228 F.3d 1255, 1261 (11th Cir. 2000).

The final case ICE cites is United States v. Doe, 666 F.2d 43 (4th Cir. 1980), which held that Fed. R. Evid. 412 gave a rape victim the "implicit" right to appeal an order allowing the defendant to admit evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior at trial. Id. at 46. A contrary ruling, the court held, would "frustrate[]" the purposes behind Rule 412. Id. But Doe's conclusion that Rule 412 created an implicit right of appeal is flawed because judge-promulgated rules, like the Federal Rules of Evidence, cannot "create * * * federal jurisdiction." Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 452-453 (2004); see also United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 725 n.13 ("[T]he Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not expand the jurisdiction of federal courts."). Nor, contrary to Doe, would a ruling that a nonparty victim cannot appeal frustrate the purposes of Rule 412 because the government, as a party to the prosecution, would retain the ability to appeal. And Doe is inapposite because it involved a pretrial appeal, not a post-judgment appeal of the sort here at issue. See Hunter, 548 F.3d at 1314 (distinguishing Doe as involving a pretrial appeal, not, as there, a post-judgment appeal).

The CVRA was intended to give victims greater participatory rights relative to criminal proceedings. One of the central means by which Congress sought to achieve that goal was to allow victims to seek immediate mandamus review of an adverse ruling. ICE contends (Opp. 12) that this mandamus remedy is a "supplemental" remedy for victims, not their "exclusive" remedy. More precisely, ICE appears to contend that victims have the option to seek either expedited mandamus review or ordinary appellate review. Even putting to one side the fact that the CVRA does not give victims the right to appeal, ICE's own actions belie its stated view. ICE invoked its statutory right to seek mandamus review, and this Court denied its petitions. Under ICE's professed view, that election should preclude an appeal – but it has not, as ICE has now appealed as well. ICE's actions thus suggest that it believes, not (as it claims) that Congress gave victims the right to choose between mandamus or appellate review, but rather, that Congress gave victims the right to seek both mandamus and appellate review. While the CVRA was designed to remedy certain imbalances in the criminal justice system's treatment of victims, ICE cites nothing to support its sweeping conclusion that Congress intended to allow victims to have two bites – i.e., mandamus review followed by appellate review – at the proverbial apple.

CONCLUSION

The parties to this prosecution have manifested their intent to bring this matter to a close and allow the judgment to become final. Having previously sought mandamus review, as permitted by law, ICE should not be permitted to proceed with its jurisdictionally-defective appeal – one that is doomed to fail anyway. Gov't Mot. to Dismiss, at 11 n.7 (noting the law-of-the-case bar to successive appellate review and ICE's inability to prove clear error). Indeed, allowing this appeal to move forward will not only consume further time and resources of the parties and the Court, but it will also prevent the judgment from truly attaining the finality that is "essential to the retributive and deterrent functions of the criminal law." Calderon v. Thompson, 523 U.S. 538, 555 (1998). This appeal should be dismissed.
