QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether before pleading guilty, a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to obtain exculpatory information, including impeachment material, from the government.
2. If so, whether that right may be waived through a plea agreement.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

ANGELA RUIZ

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

The Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States of America, respectfully petitions for a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in this case.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the court of appeals (App., infra, 1a-39a) is reported at 241 F.3d 1157.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court of appeals was entered on March 5, 2001. A petition for rehearing was denied on June 11, 2001 (App., infra, 40a). The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION INVOLVED

The Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment provides in pertinent part that “[n]o person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.”

STATEMENT

Following a guilty plea, respondent was convicted in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California on one count of importing marijuana, in violation of 21 U.S.C. 952 and 960. C.A. E.R. 60. Respondent was sentenced to 18 months’ imprisonment, to be followed by three years of supervised release. Id. at 61-62. The court of appeals vacated respondent’s sentence and remanded for resentencing. App., infra, 21a.

1. On August 13, 1999, respondent entered the United States from Mexico through the port of entry at Tecate, California C.A. E.R. 2. A search of respondent’s car uncovered approximately 66.3 pounds of marijuana concealed within it. Ibid. Respondent was arrested and transported to the Metropolitan Correctional Center. Ibid.

The United States Attorney for the Southern District of California offered respondent an opportunity to enter into a “fast-track” plea agreement. C.A. E.R. 6-7. Under the Southern District of California’s standard fast-track agreement, a defendant agrees to waive indictment, plead guilty to an information, and waive appellate rights. Gov’t C.A. Reh’g Pet., Exh. B. In addition, the standard fast-track agreement contains a provision in which the government represents that it has provided the defendant with any information in its possession that establishes the defendant’s factual innocence, and the defendant waives the right to receive any information that would impeach government witnesses or support an affirmative defense. App., infra, 46a. The waiver provision of the agreement specifically states that:

The Government represents that any information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant known to the undersigned prosecutor in this case has been turned over to the defendant. The Government understands it has a continuing duty to provide such information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant.

The defendant understands that if this case proceeded to trial, the Government would be required to provide impeachment information relating to any informants or other witnesses. In addition, if the defendant raised an affirmative defense, the Government would be required to provide information in its possession that supports such a defense. In return for the Government's promises set forth in this agreement, the defendant waives the right to this information, and agrees not to attempt to withdraw the guilty plea or to file a collateral attack based on the existence of this information.

Id. at 45a-46a. In return for the defendant's commitments, the government agrees to recommend a two-level downward departure from the offense level specified by the Sentencing Guidelines. Ibid. Respondent declined the U.S. Attorney's offer to enter into a plea agreement. Id. at 2a.

2. A federal grand jury subsequently returned a two-count indictment charging respondent with importing marijuana, in violation of 21 U.S.C. 952 and 960, and possessing marijuana with the intent to distribute it, in violation of 21 U.S.C. 841(a)(1). C.A. E.R. 1-2. Respondent pleaded guilty to the count charging her with importing marijuana. C.A. Supp. E.R. 1. At the hearing on her guilty plea, respondent stated that she understood the charge to which she was pleading guilty and the maximum penalty she faced. Id. at 2-3. She further stated that she had discussed the case with her attorney and that she was satisfied with his services. Id. at 3-4. After her attorney described her criminal conduct, respondent admitted that she drove a car containing approximately 30.1 kilograms of marijuana across the border and that she knew that there was marijuana in it. Id. at 4-5.

The Presentence Investigation Report determined that respondent's total offense level was 13 and that her criminal history category was III, yielding a Guidelines sentencing range of 18-24 months' imprisonment. See App., infra, 43a. Respondent sought a "fast-track" downward departure, asserting that she had done everything to qualify for such a departure except waive the right to receive information that would impeach government witnesses and support an affirmative defense. Id. at 41a-43a. She further argued that she had a constitutional right to receive such information under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972), and that the government had acted unconstitutionally in attempting to secure a waiver of that right. App., infra, 42a-43a. The government opposed a fast-track departure, on the ground that it had not received the benefits that accompany fast-track agreements. Id. at 42a. The district court refused to grant a downward departure and sentenced respondent to 18 months' imprisonment. Id. at 43a-44a.

3. A divided panel of the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded for resentencing. App., infra, 1a-39a. As relevant here, the court held that a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to obtain Brady material, including impeachment information, before pleading guilty and that a defendant may not validly waive that right through a plea agreement. Id. at 8a-16a

The court of appeals first reaffirmed its holding in Sanchez v. United States, 50 F.3d 1448, 1453 (9th Cir. 1995), that a defendant has a constitutional right to obtain Brady information before pleading guilty. App., infra, 9a-10a. The precise holding of Sanchez, the court stated, is that “guilty pleas cannot be deemed intelligent and voluntary if entered without knowledge of material [exculpatory] information withheld by the prosecution.” Id. at 9a. The basis for that holding, the court explained, is that “a defendant’s decision whether or not to plead guilty is often heavily influenced by his appraisal of the prosecution’s case.” Id. at 9a-10a.

The court of appeals next concluded that “[t]he rationale of Sanchez applies with equal force to plea agreements.” App., infra, 10a. The court reasoned that “[t]he disclosure of Brady evidence is just as important in ensuring the voluntary and intelligent nature of a plea bargain as it is in ensuring the voluntary and intelligent nature of a guilty plea.” Ibid. The court therefore concluded that “plea agreements, and any waiver of Brady rights contained therein, ‘cannot be deemed intelligent and voluntary if entered without knowledge of material information withheld by the prosecution.’” Ibid. The court rejected the view that a waiver is valid if limited to impeachment material bearing on the credibility of government witnesses. Id. at 13a-15a. Noting that this Court had rejected any distinction between impeachment material and other exculpatory material under Brady, id. at 14a-15a, the court held that information favorable to the defense, including impeachment material, must be disclosed whenever it “would create a reasonable probability” that the defendant would reject a plea agreement or decide to go to trial rather than plead guilty. Id. at 15a.

Based on its holding that a waiver of Brady and Giglio rights is invalid, the court of appeals further held that “it is unconstitutional for prosecutors to withhold a departure recommendation based on a defendant’s refusal to accept such a waiver.” App., infra, 18a. The court also concluded that respondent had made a sufficient showing to warrant an evidentiary hearing on whether “the Government declined to recommend a ‘fast track’ departure because [respondent] refused to waive her Brady rights.” Id. at 19a. The court remanded with directions to the district court to conduct such a hearing, and to determine in its discretion whether to remedy any violation it found. Id. at 20a.

Judge Tallman dissented. App., infra, 25a-39a. He concluded that the majority’s rule “forces the government to turn over information to a defendant immediately upon beginning plea bargain negotiations, when that information will generally be of little use to the defendant unless she goes to trial.” Id. at 38a. Judge Tallman also concluded that the majority’s rule “harms the administration of justice” by interfering with the government’s substantial interest in “maintaining the confidentiality of government witnesses and protecting ongoing investigations.” Ibid. Judge Tallman also emphasized that the majority’s rule prevents the expeditious resolution of drug courier cases because it requires prosecutors to engage in “the often time-consuming process of determining which witnesses it may call at trial, what potential impeachment information on each witness is in its possession, and whether it must disclose that information to the defendant.” Id. at 39a.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

The Ninth Circuit has held that a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to obtain Brady material, including impeachment material, before pleading guilty. The court reasoned that disclosure of such information is essential to ensure a voluntary and intelligent plea. Based on the same analysis, the court held that a defendant may not waive the right to obtain Brady material in a plea agreement. Those holdings, if left in place, would effectuate a radical change in guilty plea practice in the federal system and would produce a variety of adverse consequences in the administration of federal criminal justice. Nothing in this Court’s jurisprudence justifies the Ninth Circuit’s holdings.

Brady and this Court’s decisions applying it provide no support for the view that a defendant has a right to the production of exculpatory material before entering a valid guilty plea. Those decisions establish that a prosecutor has a duty to disclose exculpatory information to ensure that the defendant receives a fair trial. Brady does not require the government to assist a criminal defendant in making a strategic decision whether to plead guilty. Nor do this Court’s decisions support the view that a defendant must have access to the government’s files, including impeachment information relating to potential trial witnesses, in order to enter a voluntary and intelligent plea. This Court’s decisions make clear that a defendant does not need to know the strength of the government’s case in order to enter a voluntary and intelligent plea.

Even if Brady's due process rule were extended to the guilty plea stage of a criminal proceeding, a defendant who pleads guilty could validly waive the right to obtain Brady material. This Court's decisions establish that a criminal defendant may waive most constitutional rights, and there is no reason to treat a newly created Brady right differently. Thus, the Ninth Circuit not only erred in holding that a defendant has a constitutional right to obtain Brady material before pleading guilty; it also erred in holding that such a right may not be waived.

If allowed to stand, the Ninth Circuit's decision would impose serious costs on the criminal justice system. It hampers the expeditious resolution of criminal cases through guilty pleas; it endangers prospective government witnesses and the conduct of ongoing investigations; and it intrudes on the strong interest in the finality of criminal convictions. Nor is the Ninth Circuit's rule necessary to ensure the fairness or reliability of a guilty plea. Except in the most unusual circumstances, once competent counsel explains the nature of a charge to a defendant, the defendant knows whether he has committed the charged offense. If such a defendant subsequently pleads guilty and admits commission of the offense in open court, there is no reason to question the reliability of the plea.

The Ninth Circuit stands alone in the extent of its imposition of Brady disclosure duties on the prosecution as a prerequisite to an intelligent plea. While several circuits have found that the non-disclosure of exculpatory material may in certain circumstances undermine the validity of a guilty plea, no circuit has agreed with the Ninth Circuit's conclusion that disclosure of Brady material is an indispensable component of a voluntary and intelligent plea. And the Fifth Circuit has attacked the analysis used by the Ninth Circuit as inconsistent with this Court's decisions.

The criminal justice system has a pressing need for this Court's resolution of the questions whether Brady applies at the guilty plea phase of a criminal proceeding, and if so, whether such Brady rights may be waived. Because the vast majority of criminal cases in the federal system are resolved through guilty pleas, those questions have recurring national importance. Guidance from this Court is especially needed because, in general, it is not the practice of federal prosecutors to disclose impeachment information before a defendant pleads guilty. This Court's intervention is therefore warranted.

A. The Ninth Circuit's Position Conflicts With This Court's Decisions

1. The Ninth Circuit's holding that a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to obtain exculpatory information from the government before pleading guilty is unsupported by Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and the decisions applying it. Under those decisions, a prosecutor's duty to disclose exculpatory information arises only where disclosure is necessary to ensure a fair trial. Brady does not require the government to disclose information in its files in order to help a criminal defendant make a strategic decision about whether to plead guilty.

In Brady, this Court reviewed a claim that, because the prosecutor had withheld evidence of a co-defendant's confession, the defendant was constitutionally entitled to a new trial on the issue of guilt. The Court held that "suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment.” 373 U.S. at 87. The principle supporting that holding, the Court explained, is “avoidance of an unfair trial to the accused.” Ibid.

In subsequent cases, the Court has consistently limited Brady to the nondisclosure of exculpatory information that results in the denial of a fair trial. In United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), the Court emphasized as “a critical point” that “the prosecutor will not have violated his constitutional duty of disclosure [under Brady] unless his omission is of sufficient significance to result in the denial of the defendant’s right to a fair trial.” Id. at 108. The Court further explained that, because “[t]he proper standard of materiality must reflect our overriding concern with the justice of the finding of guilt,” a prosecutor’s failure to disclose exculpatory evidence violates the constitution only “if the omitted evidence creates a reasonable doubt that did not otherwise exist.” Id. at 112. The Court rejected as inconsistent with Brady a standard that would instead “focus on the impact of the undisclosed evidence on the defendant’s ability to prepare for trial.” Id. at 112 n.20.

Similarly, in United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 675 (1985), the Court explained that the purpose of the Brady rule “is not to displace the adversary system,” but to “ensure that a miscarriage of justice does not occur.” For that reason, “the prosecutor is not required to deliver his entire file to defense counsel, but only to disclose evidence favorable to the accused that, if suppressed, would deprive the defendant of a fair trial.” Ibid. (footnote omitted). Any broader right, the Court observed, “would entirely alter the character and balance of our present systems of criminal justice.” Id. at 675 n.7. The Court also reiterated that “[c]onsistent with our overriding concern with the justice of the finding of guilt, a constitutional error occurs, and the conviction must be reversed, only if the evidence is material in the sense that its suppression undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.” Id. at 678 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

More recently, in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 436-437 (1995), the Court explained that “the Constitution is not violated every time the government fails or chooses not to disclose evidence that might prove helpful to the defense.” A constitutional violation occurs only “when the government’s evidentiary suppression undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.” Id. at 434. And in Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281 (1999), the Court observed that, while the phrase “Brady violation” is sometimes used loosely to refer to any failure by the prosecution to disclose exculpatory evidence, “there is never a real ‘Brady violation’ unless the non-disclosure was so serious that there is a reasonable probability that the suppressed evidence would have produced a different verdict.”

The purpose of the Court’s Brady decisions is therefore to protect the fairness of a verdict at trial, and to guard against the risk that an innocent person might be found guilty because the government withheld evidence. That risk does not exist when a defendant enters a plea in open court, thereby “admitting guilt of a substantive crime.” United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563, 570 (1989). As the Fifth Circuit explained in Matthew v. Johnson, 201 F.3d 353, 360, cert. denied, 531 U.S. 830 (2000), “[t]he prosecutor’s duty to disclose material exculpatory information * * * exists to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial.” Since a Brady violation can be found only by assessing “the potential effects of undisclosed information on a judge’s or jury’s assessment of guilt, it follows that the failure of a prosecutor to disclose exculpatory information to an individual waiving his right to trial is not a constitutional violation.” Id. at 361-362; see also Orman v. Cain, 228 F.3d 616, 617 (5th Cir. 2000) (“Brady requires a prosecutor to disclose exculpatory evidence for purposes of ensuring a fair trial, a concern that is absent when a defendant waives trial and pleads guilty.”).

2. The Ninth Circuit made no attempt to justify its disclosure rule by reference to Brady v. Maryland or the decisions applying it. Instead, it attempted to link its holding to a separate constitutional principle—that the Due Process Clause requires that a defendant’s decision to plead guilty must be voluntary and intelligent. The court reasoned that “guilty pleas cannot be deemed intelligent and voluntary if entered without knowledge of material [exculpatory] information withheld by the prosecution.” App., infra, 9a.

a. That analysis conflicts with the decisions of this Court that address the elements of a voluntary and intelligent plea. In Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970), the Court held that a plea is deemed voluntary if it is not “induced by threats (or promises to discontinue improper harassment), misrepresentation (including unfulfilled or unfulfillable promises), or perhaps by promises that are by their nature improper as having no proper relationship to the prosecutor’s business (e.g. bribes).” Id. at 755 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court held that a plea is intelligent when a defendant is “advised by competent counsel,” is “aware of the nature of the charge against him” and “likely consequences” of the plea, and is not “incompetent or otherwise not in control of his mental faculties.” Id. at 748, 756. The elements of a voluntary and intelligent plea set forth in Brady v. United States do not include awareness of exculpatory information possessed by the government.

The Ninth Circuit added receipt of exculpatory information to the requirements for a voluntary and intelligent plea principally on the ground that “a defendant’s decision whether or not to plead guilty is often heavily influenced by his appraisal of the prosecution’s case.” App., infra, 9a-10a. This Court recognized in Brady v. United States that a defendant’s entry of a guilty plea often is influenced by the defendant’s view of the strength of the prosecution’s case. 397 U.S. at 756. But the Court went on to reject the contention that a defendant must be able to accurately assess the strength of the government’s case in order to make a voluntary and intelligent plea. The Court stated that “[t]he rule that a plea must be intelligently made to be valid does not require that a plea be vulnerable to later attack if the defendant did not correctly assess every relevant factor entering into his decision.” Id. at 757. In particular, the Court explained, “[a] defendant is not entitled to withdraw his plea merely because he discovers long after the plea has been accepted that his calculus misapprehended the quality of the State’s case.” Ibid. “We find no requirement in the Constitution,” the Court added, “that a defendant must be permitted to disown his solemn admissions in open court that he committed the act with which he is charged simply because it later develops that the State would have had a weaker case than the defendant had thought.” Ibid.

Likewise, in McMann v. Richardson, 397 U.S. 759, 770 (1970), the Court held that “a defendant’s plea of guilty based on reasonably competent advice is an intelligent plea not open to attack on the ground that counsel may have misjudged the admissibility of the defendant’s confession.” Id. at 770. Instead, “[w]hether a plea of guilty is unintelligent and therefore vulnerable when motivated by a confession erroneously thought admissible in evidence depends * * * on whether the advice was within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases.” Id. at 770-771. The Court emphasized that “the decision to plead guilty before the evidence is in frequently involves the making of difficult judgments,” and that “[i]n the face of unavoidable uncertainty, the defendant and his counsel must make their best judgment as to the weight of the State’s case.” Id. at 769. See also Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258, 267 (1973) (defendant may not attack his guilty plea on the ground that he was unaware at the time of the plea that his grand jury had been unconstitutionally selected, absent a showing that “the advice he received from counsel was not within the standards set forth in McMann”); United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563, 573 (1989) (“conscious waiver” is not required “with respect to each potential defense relinquished by a plea of guilty”).

This Court’s decisions therefore make clear that a defendant does not have to know the strength of the government’s case in order to make a voluntary and intelligent plea. The Ninth Circuit’s decision in this case is irreconcilable with those decisions.

b. The Ninth Circuit’s reliance on a defendant’s interest in knowing the strength of the government’s case before pleading guilty is subject to a second fatal objection. If an understanding of the strength of the government’s case were truly necessary in order to permit a defendant to make a voluntary and intelligent plea, disclosure of exculpatory information alone could not achieve that objective. A full understanding of the strength of the government’s case can only be achieved through a disclosure of evidence that inculcates the defendant as well. The logic of the Ninth Circuit's ruling would therefore require the government to disclose inculpatory as well as exculpatory evidence.

This Court, however, has emphatically rejected the proposition that the Due Process Clause requires the government to disclose inculpatory evidence to the defendant. See Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559 (1977); Agurs, 427 U.S. at 111 (“we have rejected the suggestion that the prosecutor has a constitutional duty routinely to deliver his entire file to defense counsel”). Indeed, for precisely that reason, the Court in Agurs rejected the contention that materiality should be defined by the impact of undisclosed evidence on a defendant's ability to prepare for trial. The Court explained that a trial preparation standard “would necessarily encompass incriminating evidence as well as exculpatory evidence, since knowledge of the prosecutor's entire case would always be useful in planning the defense.” Id. at 112 n.20. The Ninth Circuit's rationale for its Brady ruling suffers from the same flaw.

3. Equally flawed is the court of appeals' holding that a defendant pleading guilty cannot waive his right to receive Brady material or, as in this case, the sub-set of Brady material involving impeachment of government witnesses, see Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972). If a constitutional right to obtain Brady material before pleading guilty were created (with the definition of Brady material altered to turn on whether a different plea was reasonably probable if the information had been disclosed), the new right could not be rooted in the requirement that a plea must be voluntary and intelligent, because this Court's decisions rule out that analysis. See pp. 12-14, supra. Accordingly, if such a right were established, it would have to find its source in an expansion of the due process holding in

Brady itself, requiring the government to furnish exculpatory information to “protect a defendant’s own decision making regarding the costs and benefits of pleading and of going to trial.” Matthew, 201 F.3d at 362.

Under this Court’s decisions, that right, like most other constitutional rights, would be subject to waiver. As this Court explained in United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196, 201 (1995), “[a] criminal defendant may knowingly and voluntarily waive many of the most fundamental protections afforded by the Constitution.” In particular, under this Court’s cases, a defendant may waive the right to a double jeopardy defense, Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1, 10 (1987), the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 243 (1969), the right to a jury trial, ibid., the right to confront one’s accusers, ibid., and the right to counsel, Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 465 (1938). There is nothing inherent in the right to obtain Brady material that would distinguish it from those other rights. If a defendant determines to plead guilty and is willing to waive his right to obtain whatever exculpatory information there happens to be in exchange for the possibility of a reduced sentence or other considerations, no sound basis exists to prevent him from doing so, particularly with respect to the subset of information relating not to substantive evidence of guilt, but to the credibility of government witnesses.

4. In sum, under this Court’s decisions, a criminal defendant does not have a constitutional right to obtain Brady material before pleading guilty. But even if such a right were recognized based on an expansion of Brady, it would be subject to waiver through a plea agreement. The court of appeals' contrary conclusions depart from principles in this Court's jurisprudence.

B. The Ninth Circuit's Ruling Imposes Serious Costs On the Criminal Justice System And Is Not Necessary To Ensure The Fairness And Reliability Of A Plea

This Court has observed that plea bargaining is "an essential component of the administration of justice." Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 260 (1971). Indeed, "[i]f every criminal charge were subjected to a full-scale trial, the States and the Federal Government would need to multiply by many times the number of judges and court facilities." Ibid.

The Ninth Circuit's ruling significantly hampers the expeditious resolution of criminal cases through guilty pleas. If the government must routinely disclose Brady material (including witness impeachment material under Giglio) to every defendant before he pleads guilty, the time and resources devoted to a case before entry of a guilty plea would have to be substantially increased. That problem is especially acute because Brady and Giglio require the government to search the files of all members of the prosecution team. Kyles, 514 U.S. at 437. As Judge Tallman noted, in order to comply with the Ninth Circuit's decision, prosecutors would be required to engage in "the often time-consuming process of determining which witnesses it may call at trial, what potential impeachment information on each witness is in its possession, and whether it must disclose that information to the defendant." App., infra, 39a. That time-consuming and resource-intensive process would destroy a significant part of the value to the government that plea bargaining now affords. See Brady v. United States, 397

U.S. at 752 (a government interest supporting plea bargaining is that scarce judicial and prosecutorial resources are conserved for other cases).

As Judge Tallman noted, the Ninth Circuit's ruling also interferes with the government's interest in maintaining the confidentiality of its witnesses and protecting ongoing investigations. App., infra, 38a. This Court has recognized the "necessity of undercover work and the value it often is to effective law enforcement," as well as "the desirability and legality of continued secrecy even after arrest." Weatherford, 429 U.S. at 557. The Ninth Circuit's decision, however, would in some cases require the premature disclosure of confidential informants or cooperating co-defendants, needlessly disrupting ongoing investigations. The Ninth Circuit's ruling could also endanger the lives of some government witnesses. In response to the dangers that premature disclosure of government witnesses entails, Congress provided in the Jencks Act that "no statement" by a government witness "shall be the subject of subpoena, discovery, or inspection until said witness has testified on direct examination in the trial of the case." 18 U.S.C. 3500(a). See United States v. Presser, 844 F.2d 1275, 1285 (6th Cir. 1988). The court of appeals' ruling effectively nullifies that protection in a set of cases.

The court of appeals' decision also intrudes on the interest in the finality of guilty pleas. It enables a defendant to attack his plea long after he has solemnly admitted his crime in open court. The essence of a defendant's Brady claim at that point is not that his solemn admissions of guilt were false. Instead, the claim is that, if the government had disclosed a particular piece of evidence, the defendant would have recalculated the risks and benefits of his options and opted to go to trial rather than pleading guilty. App., infra, 15a.

As this Court has recognized, “[e]very inroad on the concept of finality undermines confidence in the integrity of our procedures; and, by increasing the volume of judicial work, inevitably delays and impairs the orderly administration of justice.” United States v. Timmreck, 441 U.S. 780, 784 (1979). “The impact is greatest,” the Court has emphasized, “when new grounds for setting aside guilty pleas are approved because the vast majority of criminal convictions result from such pleas.” Ibid.; Bousley v. United States, 523 U.S. 614, 621 (1998) (“the concern with finality served by the limitation on collateral attacks has special force with respect to convictions based on guilty pleas”). An intrusion on finality is particularly problematic when there is no claim that “unfair procedures may have resulted in the conviction of an innocent defendant” (Timmreck, 441 U.S. at 784)—the situation that exists when a defendant has admitted his guilt in open court.

The Ninth Circuit’s rule is unnecessary to ensure the fairness and accuracy of a guilty plea. Barring unusual circumstances, once competent counsel advises a defendant of the nature of the charges, the defendant can determine whether he is guilty of an offense. And once a defendant solemnly swears in open court that he has committed the offense, there is no reason to question the accuracy of the resulting entry of a finding of guilt. As this Court has explained, “a counseled plea of guilty is an admission of factual guilt so reliable that, where voluntary and intelligent, it quite validly removes the issue of factual guilt from the case.” Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61, 62 n.2 (1975) (per curiam); see also Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 74 (1977) (“Solemn declarations in open court carry a strong presumption of verity.”); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 363 (1978) (“Defendants advised by competent counsel and protected by other procedural safeguards are * * * unlikely to be driven to false self-condemnation.”)

C. The Ninth Circuit’s Application of Brady To Guilty Pleas Is Unique

While several courts of appeals have held that the failure to receive Brady material plays a role in deciding whether a guilty plea is valid, no court has adopted the Ninth Circuit’s sweeping rule that disclosure of Brady material is an indispensable component of a voluntary and intelligent plea. And the Fifth Circuit, in the course of declining to adopt on habeas review a rule like the Ninth Circuit’s, has repudiated the analytical premises of the decision in this case.

In Miller v. Angliker, 848 F.2d 1312, cert. denied, 488 U.S. 890 (1988), the Second Circuit held that receipt of Brady material does not affect whether a plea is voluntary and intelligent. The court explained that a plea is intelligent “if the accused had the advice of counsel and understood the consequences of his plea, even if only in a fairly rudimentary way,” and that it is voluntary “if it is not the product of actual or threatened physical harm, mental coercion overbearing the defendant’s will, or the defendant’s sheer inability to weigh his options rationally.” Id. at 1320. The court nonetheless concluded that “even a guilty plea that was ‘knowing and intelligent’ may be vulnerable to challenge if it was entered without knowledge of material evidence withheld by the prosecution.” Ibid.

The Second Circuit’s subsequent decision in United States v. Avellino, 136 F.3d 249 (1998), appears to confine the scope of the government’s obligation to turn over Brady material before a defendant pleads guilty. There, the court held that, when the government is ordered to turn over Brady material before trial, “its failure to do so may be a basis for vacating the guilty plea if the withheld evidence was material.” Id. at 262. The court recognized, however, that “guilty pleas are entered in many cases even before discovery is produced.” Ibid. The court also “express[ed] no view regarding when the government’s obligation to disclose Giglio material might arise in other cases,” and stated that “the government remains free to address the timing issue in a future case in which it fails to disclose evidence that is material in the Brady sense.” Ibid.

In Campbell v. Marshall, 769 F.2d 314, 322 (1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1048 (1986), the Sixth Circuit noted that “there is no authority within our knowledge holding that suppression of Brady material prior to trial amounts to a deprivation of due process.” The court also concluded that, while the failure to receive Brady material is relevant in deciding whether a plea is voluntary and intelligent, that issue should be resolved “in light of all the attendant circumstances.” Id. at 323. Under the Sixth Circuit’s approach, whether or not a defendant receives Brady material, other factors, including the assistance of counsel, a plea-taking procedure that complies with Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969), and a factual basis for the plea, can “go a long way toward” establishing the validity of a plea. 769 F.2d at 323-324. The Eighth Circuit has adopted the same approach as the Sixth. White v. United States, 858 F.2d 416, 422 (1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1029 (1989).

In United States v. Wright, 43 F.3d 491, 496 (1994), the Tenth Circuit held that, “under certain limited circumstances,” a prosecutor’s failure to disclose exculpatory material “can render a defendant’s plea involuntary.” The court failed to provide any concrete guidance, however, on when those limited circumstances might arise, and did not go as far as the Ninth Circuit did here in requiring Brady disclosure before the entry of any plea.

In contrast to those courts that have held that Brady has some relevance to the plea process, the Fifth Circuit, although not squarely resolving that constitutional issue, has indicated disagreement with the proposition that Brady disclosures must be made in order to ensure a valid guilty plea. See Matthew v. Johnson, 201 F.3d 353, cert. denied, 531 U.S. 830 (2000). There, a defendant sought to collaterally attack his guilty plea based on a claim that he had failed to receive Brady material before pleading guilty. The Fifth Circuit held that acceptance of the defendant's claim would require the creation of a new constitutional rule and that collateral relief was therefore unavailable under Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288 (1989). Based on its review of this Court's decisions applying Brady, the Fifth Circuit concluded that "the failure of a prosecutor to disclose exculpatory information to an individual waiving his right to trial is not a constitutional violation." 201 F.3d at 361-362. The Fifth Circuit also attacked, as inconsistent with this Court's decisions in Brady v. United States, supra, and McMann v. Richardson, supra, the position that a defendant's awareness of Brady v. Maryland material is an indispensable component of a voluntary and intelligent plea. Id. at 368-369.

No federal circuit has gone as far as the court of appeals in this case in compelling disclosure of materials in the government's files in order for the defendant's counseled admission of guilt to be found valid. But that lack of uniformity in legal positions creates uncertainty about the obligations of prosecutors in the guilty plea process.

D. The Questions Presented Are Of Recurring Importance

The criminal justice system has a pressing need for this Court's intervention to resolve the questions whether a defendant has a right to obtain Brady material before pleading guilty, and, if so, whether that right may be waived. Approximately 95% of federal convictions are obtained by guilty plea, and approximately 85% of all criminal defendants in the federal system have their cases resolved through guilty pleas. Judicial Business of the United States Courts, Annual Report of the Director (2000), Table D-4 (available at: <http://www.uscourts.gov/judbus2000/contents.html>). The questions presented in this case are therefore ones of recurring importance to federal prosecutors throughout the country. Those questions are of particular importance in the Ninth Circuit where prosecutors are bound by the decision in this case. The Ninth Circuit accounts for approximately 22% of the criminal defendants in the federal system, and approximately 23% of the criminal defendants who plead guilty. Id. at Table D-7.

Guidance from this Court is especially needed, because, in general, and apart from the obligation to comply with Ninth Circuit decisions or discovery orders, it is not the practice of federal prosecutors to disclose information that could impeach government witnesses before a defendant pleads guilty. That practice reflects a general consensus that such disclosure could endanger government witnesses, disrupt ongoing investigations, and require a significant additional commitment of scarce resources to cases before entry of guilty pleas. The trial preparation that is required to uncover much impeachment often does not even occur until it is apparent that the defendant intends to contest his guilt at a trial. By holding both that a defendant has a constitutional right to obtain all Brady material at the guilty plea stage and that the right may not be waived through a plea agreement, the Ninth Circuit has invalidated that standard plea practice. Review by this Court is warranted to decide whether the Constitution requires that dramatic change in the federal criminal justice system.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

No. 00-50048

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF-APPELLEE

v.

ANGELA RUIZ, DEFENDANT-APPELLANT

[Argued and Submitted: Oct. 12, 2000
Filed: March 5, 2001]

Before: BOOCHEVER, TASHIMA, and TALLMAN,
Circuit Judges.

Opinion by Judge BOOCHEVER; Concurrence by Judge TASHIMA; Dissent by Judge TALLMAN

BOOCHEVER, Circuit Judge:

Angela Ruiz (“Ruiz”) appeals from the sentence imposed by the district court after she pled guilty to charges of marijuana importation. Ruiz challenges the Government’s refusal to recommend, and the district court’s denial of, a downward departure from the applicable sentencing guideline range under the “fast track” program. We reverse and remand.

BACKGROUND

Ruiz was arrested for importing marijuana from Mexico into the United States. The Government offered a plea bargain which, among other things, provided for a two-level downward departure from the otherwise applicable sentencing guideline range under the “fast track” program. The United States Attorney’s Office for the Southern District of California adopted the “fast track” program to minimize the expenditure of government resources and expedite the processing of more routine cases. Plea bargains offered under this program require defendants to plead guilty, as well as waive their rights to an indictment, to an appeal, and to present motions. Defendants must also waive their rights to receive certain information pursuant to Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S. Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963). In exchange, the Government promises to recommend a two-level downward departure to the sentencing judge.¹

According to Ruiz, she declined to accept the plea bargain because it contained an unconstitutional waiver of Brady rights. She subsequently pled guilty to the charges with no plea agreement. At the sentencing hearing, Ruiz requested several downward departures, including a two-level “fast track” departure. The Government opposed the request. Ruiz claimed that she nevertheless qualified for the departure because, aside from refusing to waive her Brady rights, she substantially complied with the requirements of the “fast track” program (e.g., entering an early guilty plea and declining to file motions). Ruiz also argued that the Government opposed the “fast track” request only because she refused to enter into a plea agreement containing an unconstitutional waiver of her Brady rights.

The district court denied the downward departure because the Government provided no “fast track” recommendation and no plea agreement required the Government to do otherwise. Ruiz’s sentencing range was 18-24 months. Had Ruiz received the two-level “fast track” departure, the range would have been 12-18 months. The district court sentenced Ruiz to 18 months.

DISCUSSION

Ruiz argues that the Government’s refusal to recommend a two-level “fast track” departure was unconstitutional. At the center of Ruiz’s appeal is the contention that the right to receive undisclosed Brady evidence cannot be waived through plea agreements. Ruiz argues that, because Brady rights are not waivable, prosecutors cannot condition the benefits of a plea bargain (e.g., a “fast track” recommendation) on the waiver of such rights; or, stated alternatively, prosecutors cannot withhold the benefits of a plea bargain simply because a defendant refuses to waive her unwaivable Brady rights. According to Ruiz, the Government withheld the “fast track” recommendation for this unconstitutional reason and, therefore, the district court had authority to provide a remedy (e.g., grant the two-level “fast track” departure on its own).

Ruiz asks this court to vacate her sentence and remand the case so the district court may determine whether the Government acted with an unconstitutional motive and, if so, whether it should exercise its discretion to provide a remedy for the violation.

I. Appellate Jurisdiction

As an initial matter, the Government contends that we lack jurisdiction over Ruiz’s appeal. The Government argues that its refusal to recommend a “fast track” departure and the district court’s denial of Ruiz’s request for the same are not reviewable. We disagree.

The statute governing a defendant’s right to appeal a federal sentence, 18 U.S.C. § 3742(a), provides in relevant part:

A defendant may file a notice of appeal in the district court for review of an otherwise final sentence if the sentence—

(1) was imposed in violation of law;

(2) was imposed as a result of an incorrect application of the sentencing guidelines[.]

As a general rule, under 18 U.S.C. § 3742, we cannot review a district court’s discretionary denial of a defendant’s request for a downward departure from the sentencing guidelines. United States v. Morales, 898 F.2d 99, 102 (9th Cir. 1990). This general rule of non-reviewability, however, does not insulate any and all decisions by district courts to reject downward departures. It only precludes appellate review of the court’s exercise of discretion in such matters. See id. (decision to deny departure not reviewable because it “was an act of discretion”). Claims that the district court failed to exercise any discretion at all in rejecting a downward departure are reviewable. United States v. Cervantes-Valenzuela, 931 F.2d 27, 29 (9th Cir. 1991) (per curiam). Also, we have jurisdiction over claims that the district court rested its decision not to depart on an erroneous belief that it lacked authority to do so. United States v. Eaton, 31 F.3d 789, 793 (9th Cir. 1994).

Jurisdiction is also proper over constitutional challenges to the sentencing process, like the challenge Ruiz brings here. See, e.g., United States v. Khouiry, 62 F.3d 1138, 1140-41 (9th Cir. 1995) (holding that appellate courts have jurisdiction over constitutional challenges to government’s refusal to recommend and district court’s denial of downward departure); United States v. Arishi, 54 F.3d 596, 597-98 (9th Cir. 1995) (same); see also Wade v. United States, 504 U.S. 181, 112 S. Ct. 1840, 118 L.Ed.2d 524 (1992) (exercising jurisdiction over similar claim); United States v. Mikaelian, 168 F.3d 380, 384 (9th Cir. 1999) (same); United States v. Murphy, 65 F.3d 758, 762-64 (9th Cir. 1995) (same); United States v. Treleven, 35 F.3d 458, 460-61 (9th Cir. 1994) (same).

Although the above cases do not expressly state that constitutional challenges are reviewable under section 3742(a)(1) as claims that the sentence was “imposed in violation of law,” other circuits have articulated this sensible rationale. See, e.g., United States v. Senn, 102 F.3d 327, 331 (7th Cir. 1996) (constitutional claim that prosecutor arbitrarily refused to recommend greater downward departure satisfies “violation of law” standard of section 3742(a)); United States v. Graham, 72 F.3d 352, 358 n. 8 (3rd Cir. 1995) (constitutional claim that prosecutor tainted sentencing hearing by introducing undisclosed allegations satisfies “violation of law” standard); United States v. Holmes, 60 F.3d 1134, 1137 (4th Cir. 1995) (constitutional claim that district court sentenced defendant at top of guideline range because victims were black was claim that sentence was “imposed in violation of law”); see also United States v. Drown, 942 F.2d 55 (1st Cir. 1991) (“When a defendant unsuccessfully challenges not the judge’s exercise of discretion but the constitutionality of the scheme under which he was sentenced, the court of appeals has appellate jurisdiction under 18 U.S.C. § 3742(a)(1).”).

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that a constitutional challenge to a prosecutor’s refusal to recommend a downward departure, and a district court’s refusal to grant such a departure, is appealable under 18 U.S.C. § 3742(a)(1) as a claim that the sentence was “imposed in violation of law.” Therefore, we have jurisdiction over Ruiz’s constitutional challenge to the Government’s refusal to recommend a “fast track” departure and the district court’s refusal to grant the same.²

² The Government does not argue that we are divested of jurisdiction because the district court understood it could grant the “fast track” departure without a government recommendation. Nevertheless, the dissent would conclude jurisdiction is lacking on this basis. We decline to accept the dissent’s reading of the record. At the sentencing hearing, the district court expressed its belief with sufficient clarity that, because Ruiz rejected the Government’s plea agreement, it lacked the power to grant the “fast track” departure. It stated, “Counsel, isn’t your plea bargain a matter of contract that’s an offer and acceptance? . . . And if you don’t accept it, that’s a decision you have to make. And if you do, the Government is bound by it.” In fact, the Government confirms in its opposition brief that “[t]he district court simply pointed out that the proposed plea agreement was a contract that Ruiz did not enter into, and therefore, the unaccepted benefits were not available.” Moreover, even if the district court had understood that “the absence of [government] consent does not constitute an absolute and categorical bar to departure” under the “fast track” program, see United States v. Rodriguez-Lopez, 198 F.3d 773, 775-76 (9th Cir. 1999), we doubt such a general understanding would entitle the district court to ignore a defendant’s specific constitutional challenge to the sentencing process and preclude appellate review of the same.

The Government argues in the alternative (and the dissent would agree) that, by pleading guilty, Ruiz forfeited her right to challenge the constitutionality of the Brady waiver contained in the plea bargain she rejected before entering her guilty plea. Generally, an unconditional guilty plea extinguishes the right to appeal all rulings and constitutional defects preceding the plea. United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563, 109 S. Ct. 757, 102 L.Ed.2d 927 (1989).

The Government mischaracterizes Ruiz's appeal. Ruiz claims that the Government violated her constitutional rights after she pled guilty. Specifically, she asserts that the Government unconstitutionally refused to recommend the "fast track" departure at the sentencing hearing. As the alleged constitutional violation from which Ruiz seeks relief did not occur until after the guilty plea, Ruiz is entitled to seek review. We recognize that, to prevail on her downward departure claim, Ruiz must show that the Brady waiver contained in the rejected plea agreement is unconstitutional. However, this showing is only relevant as evidence that the Government acted with an unconstitutional motive at the sentencing hearing.

The Government also suggests that Ruiz's appeal must fail because Ruiz is trying to enforce the terms of a plea bargain (i.e., the two-level "fast track" departure) which she rejected. Again, the Government mischaracterizes Ruiz's appeal. Ruiz is not attempting to enforce the rejected plea agreement as a contract. As discussed above, she brings a constitutional challenge to the Government's refusal to recommend a downward departure from the sentencing guidelines. The rejected plea agreement, with the two-level "fast track" departure and the Brady waiver, is merely evidence of the Government's allegedly impermissible motive.

II. Constitutionality of the Government's Refusal to Recommend the "Fast Track" Departure

Ruiz argues that the Government unconstitutionally refused to recommend a "fast-track" departure. Specifically, Ruiz contends that: (1) the right to receive undisclosed Brady evidence is not subject to waiver through plea agreements, (2) prosecutors cannot withhold a "fast track" recommendation simply because a defendant declines to waive her Brady rights, and (3) the Government here withheld the "fast track" recommendation for this reason. We address each argument in turn.

A. Validity of Brady Waiver

The plea agreement offered by the Government contained a waiver of certain rights under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 83 S. Ct. 1194, 10 L.Ed.2d 215 (1963). In Brady, the Supreme Court held that the Due Process Clause requires prosecutors to disclose evidence that is material and favorable to the defendant. Ruiz argues that defendants cannot voluntarily and intelligently waive the constitutional right to receive undisclosed Brady evidence and, therefore, any such waiver is invalid. We review the validity of a waiver contained in a plea agreement de novo. United States v. Martinez, 143 F.3d 1266, 1270 (9th Cir. 1998).

1. Waiver of Brady Rights in General

Some constitutional rights are automatically waived by entering an unconditional guilty plea. Such rights include, among others, the right to a jury trial, the right to confront one's accusers, and the right to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination, McCarthy v. United States, 394 U.S. 459, 466, 89 S. Ct. 1166, 22 L.Ed.2d 418 (1969), as well as the right to challenge constitutional defects which occur before entry of the plea. Broce, 488 U.S. at 573-74, 109 S. Ct. 757.

Of the rights that survive entry of a guilty plea, some still may be expressly waived through plea agreements. For example, defendants generally may agree to waive the right to appeal the sentence, United States v. Baramdyka, 95 F.3d 840, 843 (9th Cir. 1996), and the right to file a civil suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 seeking redress for government violations of constitutional rights. Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386, 397- 98, 107 S. Ct. 1187, 94 L.Ed.2d 405 (1987).

Some rights, however, can never be waived. For example, a plea agreement cannot bar defendants from asserting “claims involving a breach of the plea agreement, racial disparity in sentencing among codefendants or an illegal sentence imposed in excess of a maximum statutory penalty.” Baramdyka, 95 F.3d at 843. Nor can defendants waive the right to a unanimous jury verdict, United States v. Ullah, 976 F.2d 509, 512 (9th Cir. 1992), or a speedy trial. United States v. Lloyd, 125 F.3d 1263, 1268 (9th Cir. 1997).

Ruiz argues that the due process right to receive undisclosed Brady information falls into the category of rights that can never be waived. Although no court has addressed whether Brady rights are waivable through plea agreements, we have determined that Brady rights are not automatically waived by entry of a guilty plea. In Sanchez v. United States, 50 F.3d 1448 (1995), we held that guilty pleas “cannot be deemed intelligent and voluntary if entered without knowledge of material information withheld by the prosecution.” Id. at 1453 (quotation marks omitted). We reasoned that “a defendant's decision whether or not to plead guilty is often heavily influenced by his appraisal of the prosecution's case." Id. (quotation marks omitted). Also, we explained that "if a defendant may not raise a Brady claim after a guilty plea, prosecutors may be tempted to deliberately withhold exculpatory information as part of an attempt to elicit guilty pleas." Id.

The rationale of Sanchez applies with equal force to plea agreements. Plea agreements, like guilty pleas, must be entered voluntarily and intelligently to satisfy due process requirements. See Baramdyka, 95 F.3d at 843; United States v. Navarro-Botello, 912 F.2d 318, 321-22 (9th Cir. 1990). The disclosure of Brady evidence is just as important in ensuring the voluntary and intelligent nature of a plea bargain as it is in ensuring the voluntary and intelligent nature of a guilty plea. In both situations, the defendant's decision "is often heavily influenced by his appraisal of the prosecution's case." Sanchez, 50 F.3d at 1453. Moreover, the same prosecutorial incentive to withhold Brady information that would arise if guilty pleas extinguished Brady rights, would arise if plea agreements could extinguish those rights. See id. Therefore, plea agreements, and any waiver of Brady rights contained therein, "cannot be deemed intelligent and voluntary if entered without knowledge of material information withheld by the prosecution." Id. (quotation marks omitted).³

Other circuits have applied the same rationale to bar waivers of ineffective assistance of counsel claims associated with the negotiation of plea agreements. Claims of ineffective assistance of counsel, like claims based on the failure to disclose Brady evidence, challenge the voluntary and intelligent nature of the plea agreement. As the Eighth Circuit recently explained, a “decision to enter into a plea agreement cannot be knowing and voluntary when the plea agreement itself is the result of advice outside the range of competence[.]” DeRoo v. United States, 223 F.3d 919, 923-24 (8th Cir. 2000) (quotation marks omitted). Therefore, “[j]ustice dictates that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in connection with the negotiation of [an] agreement cannot be barred by the agreement itself—the very product of the alleged ineffectiveness.” Id. (quoting Jones v. United States, 167 F.3d 1142, 1145 (7th Cir. 1999)); see also United States v. Cockerham, 237 F.3d 1179, 1187 (10th Cir. 2001) (waiver in plea agreement cannot bar ineffective assistance of counsel claims associated with negotiation of agreement); United States v. Henderson, 72 F.3d 463, 465 (5th Cir. 1995) (waiver of appeal does not bar “claim that the plea agreement generally, and the defendant’s waiver of appeal specifically, were tainted by ineffective assisdated.”); Erica G. Franklin, Comment, Waiving Prosecutorial Disclosure in the Guilty Plea Process: A Debate on the Merits of “Discovery” Waivers, 51 Stan. L. Rev. 567, 581 (1999) (waiver of Brady rights can never be intelligent and knowing because “the waiver, by definition, assures that the defendant can never know what he is waiving”).

tance of counsel”); United States v. Craig, 985 F.2d 175, 178 (4th Cir. 1993) (same).⁴

For the same reason courts have concluded that the ineffective assistance of counsel during plea negotiations invalidates the plea agreement, we conclude that the failure to disclose Brady evidence also invalidates the plea agreement. In both cases, by definition, the defendant cannot accept the plea agreement intelligently and voluntarily as required by due process. Without an intelligent and voluntary acceptance, the plea agreement cannot be valid. If the plea agreement is invalid, all waivers contained in the plea agreement, including the waiver of the right to receive undisclosed Brady evidence, must also be invalid. The “waiver [can]not bar claims that relate to the validity of the waiver itself.” United States v. Racich, 35 F. Supp. 2d 1206, 1210 (N.D. Cal. 1999), aff’d, 215 F.3d 1335 (9th Cir. 2000).⁵

The Government contends that a plea agreement’s waiver of the right to receive undisclosed Brady evidence satisfies the voluntary and intelligent requirement because, unlike the entry of a guilty plea, a plea agreement ensures that the defendant is aware of the rights being waived. In Sanchez, however, it was not the government's failure to disclose the right to Brady evidence that we found rendered guilty pleas involuntary and unintelligent; it was the failure to disclose the actual Brady evidence. See Sanchez, 50 F.3d at 1454. A defendant's abstract awareness of her rights under Brady is a pale substitute for the receipt of concrete Brady material which, for example, may include evidence that the arresting officer was twice convicted of perjury or that another suspect confessed to the crime. Without disclosure of the Brady evidence itself, the plea agreement and the Brady waiver contained therein cannot be intelligent and voluntary. Therefore, we conclude that a defendant's right to receive undisclosed Brady material cannot be waived through a plea agreement and that any such waiver is invalid.

⁴ We have expressed our approval of this conclusion in dicta. See United States v. Pruitt, 32 F.3d 431, 433 (9th Cir. 1994) (“We doubt that a plea agreement could waive a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel’s erroneously unprofessional inducement of the defendant to plead guilty or accept a particular plea bargain.”); United States v. Abarca, 985 F.2d 1012, 1014 (9th Cir. 1992) (stating that express waiver of appeal does not categorically foreclose claim based on ineffective assistance of counsel or involuntariness of waiver); see also Baramdyka, 95 F.3d at 844 (following Pruitt).

2. Waiver of Impeachment Evidence

The Government argues that, even if a waiver of all Brady rights is invalid, the plea agreement at issue here is still valid because it only waives some Brady rights. In particular, the plea agreement's waiver only applies to impeachment evidence, i.e., Brady information relating to the credibility of government witnesses. It does not apply to exculpatory evidence, i.e., Brady information relating to the factual innocence of the defendant. The waiver provides:

WAIVER OF RIGHT TO BE PROVIDED WITH
IMPEACHMENT AND AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE
INFORMATION

The Government represents that any information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant known to the undersigned prosecutor in this case has been turned over to the defendant. The Government understands it has continuing duty to provide such information establishing factual innocence of the defendant.

The defendant understands that if this case proceeded to trial, the Government would be required to provide impeachment information relating to any informants or other witnesses. In addition, if the defendant raised an affirmative defense, the Government would be required to provide information in its possession that supports such a defense. In return for the Government's promises set forth in this agreement, the defendant waives the right to this information, and agrees not to attempt to withdraw the guilty plea or to file a collateral attack based on the existence of this information.

The Brady rule encompasses impeachment evidence as well as exculpatory evidence. United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 676, 105 S. Ct. 3375, 87 L.Ed.2d 481 (1985). The Government contends that impeachment evidence is only relevant if there is going to be a trial. Therefore, according to the Government, it need not disclose such evidence at the pretrial, plea bargain stage. In Bagley, however, the Supreme Court declined to recognize any meaningful difference between these two types of Brady evidence. "This Court has rejected any such distinction between impeachment evidence and exculpatory evidence. . . . When the reliability of a given witness may well be determinative of guilt or innocence, nondisclosure of evidence affecting credibility falls within th[e] general rule [of Brady].” Id. at 676-677, 105 S. Ct. 3375 (quotation marks omitted).

Moreover, nothing in Sanchez suggests that only exculpatory evidence must be disclosed before the entry of a guilty plea. In Sanchez, we held that prosecutors must disclose Brady material before a defendant enters a guilty plea, without drawing a distinction between exculpatory and impeachment evidence. 50 F.3d at 1453. Nor would such a distinction make much sense. In the context of guilty pleas, the government is only required to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant if it is “material.” Id. Evidence is “material” if “there is a reasonable probability that but for the failure to disclose the Brady material, the defendant would have refused to plead and would have gone to trial.” Id. at 1454. We see no reason why prosecutors should be permitted to withhold “material” impeachment evidence when disclosure of such evidence would create a reasonable probability the defendant would reject the plea agreement.

The principal case upon which the Government relies, United States v. Gordon, 844 F.2d 1397 (9th Cir. 1988), is consistent with this conclusion. In Gordon, we held that prosecutors must disclose Brady information “at a time when disclosure would be of value to the accused.” Id. at 1403 (quotation marks omitted). Applying this principle in the context of a trial, we determined that the prosecution was required to disclose the impeachment evidence while the accused still had an opportunity to impeach the testifying witness. Id. This does not mean, as the Government contends, that impeachment evidence is only valuable if there is going to be a trial. It simply means that, if there is going to be a trial, impeachment evidence, like exculpatory evidence, must be disclosed while it still is valuable.

When there is not going to be a trial, however, as in the context of plea bargaining, Brady evidence is only valuable to the accused if it is disclosed before acceptance of the plea agreement. See Sanchez, 50 F.3d at 1454 (“the decision whether or not to plead guilty is often heavily influenced by [the defendant’s] appraisal of the prosecution’s case”). Accordingly, we reject the Government’s argument that it need only disclose impeachment evidence if there is going to be a trial, and we conclude that the limited Brady waiver contained in the Government’s plea agreement is invalid.

This conclusion, however, does not by itself entitle Ruiz to relief. She must also demonstrate that, as a legal matter, it is unconstitutional or arbitrary for prosecutors to oppose a downward departure based on a defendant’s refusal to waive Brady rights. Finally, Ruiz must show that, as a factual matter, the Government opposed the downward departure for this reason.

B. Constitutionality of Opposing Downward Departure Based on Defendant’s Refusal to Waive Brady Rights

Prosecutors cannot withhold a recommendation for a downward departure on the basis of an unconstitutional motive (e.g., racial or religious discrimination) or arbitrarily (i.e., for reasons not rationally related to any legitimate governmental interest). Wade v. United States, 504 U.S. 181, 185-86, 112 S. Ct. 1840, 118 L.Ed.2d 524 (1992); see also United States v. Treleven, 35 F.3d 458, 461 (9th Cir. 1994) (relief appropriate if “the government’s refusal to move for a downward departure was based on impermissible motives, constituted a breach of a plea agreement, or was not rationally related to any legitimate government purpose”).⁶

Ruiz contends that the Government acted with an unconstitutional motive in refusing to recommend a “fast track” departure at her sentencing hearing. Ruiz argues that, because Brady rights are not waivable, the Government cannot legitimately withhold the benefits of a departure recommendation based on Ruiz’s refusal to waive these rights. The Government suggests that conditioning a plea agreement on the waiver of Brady rights is nevertheless proper because Ruiz was always free to reject the agreement.

It is true that “incentives for plea bargaining are not unconstitutional merely because they are intended to encourage a defendant to forego constitutionally protected conduct.” United States v. Villasenor-Cesar, 114 F.3d 970, 975 (9th Cir. 1997) (internal alterations, quotation marks omitted). This general rule, however, does not mean prosecutors may, for any reason, withhold discretionary benefits offered in a rejected plea bargain. See, e.g., Khoury, 62 F.3d at 1141-43 (government cannot vindictively withhold departure recommendation simply because defendant rejected plea bargain and exercised right to trial).

⁶ The Government, as well as the dissent, suggest that this rule only applies to downward departure recommendations based on a defendant’s “substantial assistance” to the government and does not apply to recommendations under the “fast track” program. Although the facts in Wade involved a “substantial assistance” recommendation, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that prosecutorial decisions in general are subject to constitutional limitations. In concluding that prosecutors cannot withhold “substantial assistance” recommendations for unconstitutional or arbitrary reasons, the Court explained, “[W]e see no reason why courts should treat a prosecutor’s refusal to file a substantial-assistance motion differently from a prosecutor’s other decisions.” Wade, 504 U.S. at 185, 112 S. Ct. 1840. Likewise, we see no reason why courts should treat a prosecutor’s refusal to file a “fast track” motion differently from a prosecutor’s other decisions.

More importantly, the general rule that prosecutors may encourage the waiver of constitutional rights is premised on the assumption that the targeted rights may be validly waived. See, e.g., United States v. Murphy, 65 F.3d 758 (9th Cir. 1995) (involving incentives to forgo waivable right to trial). Here, in contrast, the due process right to receive undisclosed Brady material cannot be waived without offending another due process requirement, namely, that plea agreements be entered voluntarily and intelligently. Because Brady waivers are themselves unconstitutional, we conclude it is unconstitutional for prosecutors to withhold a departure recommendation based on a defendant's refusal to accept such a waiver.

C. Evidence of Improper Motive

Ruiz must also make a “substantial threshold showing” by producing evidence that the Government, in fact, acted with an unconstitutional motive in refusing to move for a downward departure. See Wade, 504 U.S. at 186, 112 S. Ct. 1840. If Ruiz succeeds in making this showing, she would be entitled to an evidentiary hearing on remand regarding the Government's motives. Id. If the district court on remand determines that the Government acted with an unconstitutional motive, then it may, in its discretion, provide a remedy for the violation (e.g., grant Ruiz's request for the “fast track” departure). See id. at 185-86, 112 S. Ct. 1840.

As discussed above, Ruiz argues that the Government opposed the “fast track” departure because she refused to waive her Brady rights. To show the Government was motivated by this impermissible consideration, Ruiz’s counsel represented in the sentencing memorandum, at the sentencing hearing, and in the briefs on appeal, that Ruiz rejected the plea bargain only because it contained the Brady waiver. The Government argues that no admissible evidence supports Ruiz’s claim that she rejected the plea bargain for this reason. The district court did not make any factual findings regarding the motives of Ruiz or the Government.

It is undisputed, however, that the plea bargain offered by the Government contained a waiver of certain Brady rights, that Ruiz rejected that plea bargain, and that the Government opposed the “fast track” departure because no plea bargain obligated it to do otherwise. The district court denied Ruiz’s request for a “fast track” departure due to the absence of any plea agreement providing that benefit. We find that this showing, combined with defense counsel’s consistent representations to the sentencing judge that Ruiz declined the plea bargain only because it contained a Brady waiver, is sufficient to warrant an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the Government declined to recommend a “fast track” departure because Ruiz refused to waive her Brady rights.⁷

The Government also argues that even if it opposed the departure because Ruiz refused to waive her Brady rights, the district court rejected her request for an altogether different reason. Specifically, the Government contends that the district court denied Ruiz's request for the "fast track" departure because it believed that, without a plea agreement, Ruiz did not qualify for the departure. A district court's denial of a downward departure on this basis, however, does not insulate a prosecutor's underlying improper motive for failing to recommend a departure. See Wade, 504 U.S. at 185-86, 112 S. Ct. 1840 (district court precluded from denying downward departure based on government's refusal to recommend it if government did so for unconstitutional reasons).

We find that Ruiz has made a substantial threshold showing that the Government acted with an unconsti-refused to waive her right to undisclosed Brady material. Ruiz need not demonstrate anything more to make a "substantial threshold showing" and secure the right to an evidentiary hearing on remand regarding this matter. See Wade, 504 U.S. at 186, 112 S. Ct. 1840.

The dissent also would hold that the constitutionality of the Government's Brady waiver "is wholly irrelevant to whether the prosecutor acted with an unconstitutional motive at sentencing." Dissent at 2769. However, if the Brady waiver were constitutional, Ruiz would have no basis for arguing that the Government withheld the "fast track" recommendation for an unconstitutional reason. See Murphy, 65 F.3d at 763 (finding no unconstitutional motive when prosecutor conditioned recommendation on waiver of waivable right to jury trial because no additional showing of prosecutorial vindictiveness). Therefore, the question of whether the Brady waiver is constitutional is not only relevant, it is integral to the determination of whether Ruiz has presented a "substantial threshold showing" that the Government acted with an impermissible motive.

tutional motive in refusing to recommend the “fast track” departure. Accordingly, Ruiz is entitled to an evidentiary hearing on remand concerning her constitutional claim.

CONCLUSION

We vacate Ruiz’s sentence and remand the case for resentencing. On remand, the district court shall conduct an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the Government withheld the “fast track” recommendation because Ruiz refused to waive her Brady rights. If the district court finds that the Government acted, at least in part, for this reason, it must then determine in its discretion whether to provide a remedy for the violation.

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

TASHIMA, Circuit Judge, concurring:

I concur fully in Judge Boochever’s majority opinion. I write separately only to respond to two points made by the dissent.

In making its argument that we lack appellate jurisdiction in this case, the dissent criticizes the majority for relying “primarily on cases dealing with substantial assistance departures. . . .” The dissent mistakenly asserts that these cases are not relevant to our jurisdiction to hear this appeal. “Section 5K1.1 is different from other departures because a court generally may not order a downward departure under § 5K1.1 unless the prosecutor first moves for it. Most other downward departures, including the fast track depar- ture at issue here, may be granted on motion of the defense and at the district court's discretion, regardless of the prosecutor's position." Dissent at 2765 (citing U.S.S.G. § 5K2.0) (emphasis added).

While it is true that there is no statutory requirement that "the prosecutor first move[] for it," it does not follow that a fast track departure may be granted at the district court's discretion, "regardless of the prosecutor's position." The reason that the prosecutor's position cannot, as a practical matter, be disregarded is because the fast track departure itself is extra-statutory, i.e., it likely is not authorized by § 5K2.0, or any other provision of the Guidelines. Thus, if such a departure were granted in a case in which the prosecution was opposed to it, the prosecution could conceivably appeal the departure,¹ and would have strong ground to argue for a reversal.

The fast track "policy" of the United States Attorney for the Southern District of California provides for a two-level downward departure from the offense level otherwise calculated in accordance with the Sentencing Guidelines, if the defendant agrees to certain conditions, i.e., waiver of indictment, plea of guilty, waiver of pre-trial motions, and waiver of right to appeal.² It is highly doubtful, to say the least, that such a departure is authorized by the Guidelines.³ A fast track departure is nowhere specifically authorized by the Guidelines.⁴ It is also doubtful that the fast track departure can be justified under § 5K2.0, which authorizes only case-by-case departures in unusual cases, not wholesale departures on the basis of a district-wide “policy” of the prosecutor. See U.S.S.G. § 5K2.0 (Policy Statement) (“The decision as to whether and to what extent departure is warranted rests with the sentencing court on a case-specific basis.”). Further, to justify a departure under § 5K2.0, “certain aspects of the case must be found unusual enough for it to fall outside the heartland of cases in the Guideline.” Id. (Commentary) (quoting Koon v. United States, 518 U.S. 81, 98, 116 S. Ct. 2035, 135 L.Ed.2d 392 (1996)). Cf. United States v. Banuelos-Rodriguez, 215 F.3d 969, 972-75 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (discussing why existence of a fast track departure policy in another district was not a proper ground for departure in the sentencing district which had no such policy). Yet, there is no requirement in the fast track departure policy of a finding that the case falls outside of the heartland of illegal reentry cases; indeed, the policy seems to target precisely the run-of-the-mill, heartland case.

¹ Granted, it would take real "chutzpah" for it to do so, but such chutzpah has been demonstrated before. See United States v. Ramirez-Cortez, 213 F.3d 1149, 1159 (9th Cir. 2000) (Silverman, J., dissenting).

² It is important to note that this departure "policy" is a policy of the United States Attorney; it is not the policy of the United States Sentencing Commission or even of the district court.

For these reasons, as a practical matter, fast track departure cases are more like substantial assistance cases than other types of departures in that it would be highly unlikely that a court would feel free to exercise its doubtful discretion to grant such a departure in the absence of the government's agreement to do so. On the other hand, they are routinely granted when recommended by the government.⁵ Thus, I submit that the dissent is mistaken in its assumption that "the district court in departure cases relevant to the instant case can be presumed to know that it has discretion to depart because a motion by the prosecutor is not statutorily required." Dissent at 2766. While the dissent's presumption is rightly applied in cases clearly falling within § 5K2.0, it has no application with respect to the extra-statutory, fast track departure. I thus conclude that reviewability of the district court's failure or refusal to grant a fast track departure should be judged by the standards which we employ to determine whether a court's failure or refusal to grant a substantial assistance departure is reviewable. Under those cases, as the majority opinion correctly concludes, we have jurisdiction to review the district court's decision not to depart under the fast track policy in this case.

⁵ The fast track policy can remain workable only so long as the parties can depend on the court to carry through with the government's bargain in the fast track plea agreement that, in return for reducing the government's prosecutorial burden, the defendant will receive the benefit of an extra two-level downward departure outside the parameters of the Guidelines.

Finally, we are no less mindful of the extremely heavy workload in the Southern District of California than is the dissent. We disagree, however, with its alarmist prediction that this decision “jeopardizes the fast track program.” Dissent at 2773. As the dissent itself points out, this is a “simple case,” as are most § 1326 cases. Id. In such cases, there will usually be no more than one or two government witnesses and, in all likelihood, no impeachment material in the prosecution’s possession. Thus, in most cases, compliance with the government’s Brady obligation respecting impeachment material in its possession should not be onerous.

Increased prosecutorial efficiency is a commendable goal, but it surely should not be advanced at the cost of requiring the accused to give up an unwaivable constitutional right. The appropriate solution to the Southern District of California’s caseload crisis⁶ is for Congress to authorize more judgeships, not to shortcut the Constitution.

TALLMAN, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The Court today crafts a rule that is both unnecessary to the disposition of this case and detrimental to the ability of an overburdened and understaffed district to dispose fairly and expeditiously of criminal cases under the “fast track” program. I respectfully dissent.

⁶ As the dissent points out, the weighted caseload per active judgeship in the Southern District of California was more than twice the median caseload of all districts in the Ninth Circuit. See dissent at 2773 n. 4.

I. BACKGROUND.

Shortly after her arrest and initial appearance, the government offered Angela Ruiz, a “mule” caught red-handed carrying drugs across the border, a plea bargain. The agreement, if accepted, would have required her to file no motions other than certain sentencing memoranda, to plead guilty within 30 days of her initial appearance, and to waive her rights to an indictment and to non-exculpatory impeachment material.¹ In exchange, the government would argue at her sentencing hearing for a two-level fast track downward departure, which the sentencing court would have plenary discretion to grant or deny. Had she taken it, the district court would have achieved a quick disposition in a simple case. The parties would have been spared the time and expense of pre-trial proceedings and trial preparation. And the defendant would have received the benefit of a reduced sentence. But Ruiz chose to decline the government’s offer to participate in the fast track program.

The prosecutor was forced to continue with the costly, time-consuming process of prosecuting her case. The grand jury proceeded to indict her. She was arraigned and a date for the motions hearing was set. Prior to the motions hearing, Ruiz’s appearance bond was revoked and she was remanded to custody because she had tested positive for use of cocaine and PCP. Two months after her initial appearance, without reference to the fast track agreement previously offered by the government, Ruiz entered an unconditional plea of guilty.

Despite Ruiz's rejection of the fast track plea offer, at the sentencing hearing her counsel argued that she was entitled to a two-level fast track downward departure. The government opposed the motion. The trial court considered her argument and rejected it. She was sentenced within the guidelines range for the crime to which she had unconditionally pled guilty.

Ruiz now asks us to reverse the district court and to give her the benefit of the fast track agreement that she rejected despite the fact that she deprived the government of its benefit by forcing it to indict her and continue prosecuting her. She asserts that she is entitled to this benefit because requiring her to waive her right to impeachment information places an unconstitutional condition on her acceptance of the agreement.

Ruiz's counsel concocted this argument post hoc in an attempt to obtain for his client a second bite at the sentencing apple. Prior to sentencing, Ruiz did not object to the plea offer's requirement that she waive her right to impeachment material. The record is devoid of any evidence that she requested from the government an agreement that did not contain such a waiver.

The majority, announcing today for the first time that the right to impeachment information is one of those rare constitutional rights that cannot be waived, has regrettably decided to give Ruiz another bite. I cannot join in this unprecedented decision.

II. JURISDICTION.

We lack subject-matter jurisdiction to hear this case for two reasons. First, we do not have jurisdiction to review a district court's decision to deny a request for a downward departure. Second, Ruiz unconditionally pled guilty to the charge of marijuana importation. We have no jurisdiction to review a defendant's claim that her constitutional rights were violated if the alleged violation occurred prior to the entry of an unconditional guilty plea. We therefore cannot decide whether Ruiz can waive her rights to impeachment information.

A. Jurisdiction to Review Ruiz's Sentence.

The majority characterizes Ruiz's claim as a challenge to the sentence based on the prosecutor's alleged unconstitutional motive in refusing to recommend the downward departure. With few exceptions, we lack jurisdiction to review a district court's decision not to depart. See United States v. Morales, 898 F.2d 99, 102 (9th Cir. 1990).

1. The District Court's Discretion to Depart.

The majority relies primarily on cases dealing with substantial assistance departures in deciding that this case falls within an exception to the jurisdictional bar.² See Op. at 2774. See also U.S.S.G. § 5K1.1. These cases are not relevant to the type of departure requested by Ruiz. Section 5K1.1 is different from other departures because a court generally may not order a downward departure under § 5K1.1 unless the prosecutor first moves for it. Most other downward departures, including the fast track departure at issue here, may be granted on motion of the defense and at the district court's discretion, regardless of the prosecutor's position. See U.S.S.G. § 5K2.0.

The requirement under § 5K1.1 that the prosecutor move prior to the district court having authority to depart is the underlying basis for the litigation that gives rise to the cases cited by the majority. Those cases deal with whether, if the prosecutor refuses for some reason to move for the departure, the district court has the authority to grant the departure notwithstanding the lack of a motion, as is required. See, e.g., United States v. Khoury, 62 F.3d 1138 (9th Cir. 1995). In Khoury we held that if the defendant makes a “substantial threshold showing” that the prosecutor acted with an unconstitutional motive in refusing to move for a § 5K1.1 departure, the district court must conduct a hearing to determine whether such a motive existed and whether the departure should be granted despite the lack of a motion by the prosecutor. Id. at 1141. If the district court, without conducting a “substantial threshold showing” inquiry, concludes that it does not have discretion to depart, its decision is reviewable on appeal. Id.

If, however, the district court concludes that the defendant did not make a substantial threshold showing of unconstitutional motive, then the district court has no discretion to depart. See United States v. Murphy, 65 F.3d 758, 762 (9th Cir. 1995). In such a situation, the only determination that is reviewable on appeal is whether the defendant made a substantial threshold showing of unconstitutional motive. Id. Finally, if the district court decides that it has discretion to depart, and exercises that discretion by denying the departure, its decision is not reviewable on appeal. See id.

The presumption in § 5K1.1 cases is that the district court did not know that it had discretion to depart unless it clearly indicated that it did know. In contrast, the district court in departure cases relevant to the instant case can be presumed to know that it has discretion to depart because a motion by the prosecutor is not statutorily required. Although in cases not involving § 5K1.1 a district court may consider a prosecutor's arguments in favor of or against the departure when a prosecutor makes such an argument, the court has the discretion to depart and can do so sua sponte. We recently acknowledged: "To hold that government consent [to a departure] is a mandatory condition in cases other than those in which government consent is explicitly required by the Guidelines (as it is, for example, in departures for substantial assistance), . . . runs afoul . . . of the Guidelines themselves, by impermissibly shifting the locus of discretionary decision-making from the district judge to the prosecution." United States v. Rodriguez-Lopez, 198 F.3d 773, 778 (9th Cir. 1999) (emphasis added).

Because other sentencing departures do not require the prosecutor to move, it makes sense to treat the district court's decision differently in cases that do not involve departures under § 5K1.1. We may presume in these cases, including in the instant case, that the district court knows what the law is and applies the law correctly even if it does not explicitly acknowledge that it has discretion and is exercising that discretion. See United States v. Eaton, 31 F.3d 789, 793 (9th Cir. 1994) (“We have held that a court’s failure to depart without any comment on its authority to do so does not automatically convert a discretionary departure into a sentence imposed in violation of law.”); United States v. Garcia-Garcia, 927 F.2d 489, 491 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that a sentence imposed was not in violation of the law under § 3742(a) when the district court said nothing about its discretion to depart and simply imposed the sentence without comment). Cf. United States v. Cervantes-Valenzuela, 931 F.2d 27, 29 (9th Cir. 1991) (“We assume that the district court knows and applies the law correctly. . . .”). Thus, we only have jurisdiction to review decisions not to depart in § 5K2.0 departure cases if the district court explicitly states or clearly indicates that it believes it does not have discretion to depart.

In this case, a fair reading of the transcript does not indicate in any way that the district court believed that it was not authorized to make a departure in the absence of a government motion. Although the district court did question Ruiz about her rejection of the plea agreement, it never stated nor even implied that it could not depart on its own. It recognized its discretion not to depart even if the prosecutor had moved for the departure. It concluded:

The Court has read and considered the presentence report, the sentencing documents filed on behalf of the Defendant, and the Court finds that the base level of the offense is 18. . . . [T]he Court feels that this is not a proper case for any departures except for provided for by the regular sentencing procedures.

This statement is sufficient to establish that the district court exercised discretion in refusing to grant Ruiz the downward departure she sought.

2. The “Substantial Threshold Showing” Requirement.

Even following the majority’s new rule that the § 5K1.1 standard applies to fast track downward departures, Ruiz failed to make a “substantial threshold showing” that the prosecutor acted with an unconstitutional motive. To make a substantial threshold showing of unconstitutional motive, a defendant must show that the prosecutor was vindictively punishing her for exercising a constitutional right by refusing to move for the departure.

In Khoury, for example, the prosecutor initially moved for a substantial assistance departure at sentencing, but after the defendant withdrew his guilty plea, went to trial, and was found guilty, the prosecutor refused to make a new motion for substantial assistance. Khoury, 62 F.3d at 1139- 40. We held that this constituted a substantial threshold showing of unconstitutional motive because nothing had changed between the first sentencing hearing and the second, other than the trial, that would reasonably lead the prosecutor to no longer believe that the defendant had offered substantial assistance. Id. at 1142. From this, the district court in Khoury could infer that the prosecutor was punishing the defendant for exercising his right to trial, thus justifying a hearing to make a determination as to whether the prosecutor acted improperly. Compare id. with Murphy, 65 F.3d at 763 (holding that the defendant did not meet the substantial threshold showing merely by offering evidence that the prosecutor threatened to withhold a § 5K1.1 motion if the defendant went to trial, and then carrying out that threat).

Unlike Khoury, where the only reasonable inference was that the prosecutor was punishing the defendant for exercising his right to trial, here there were other highly plausible, and more likely reasons why the prosecutor refused to move for the departure. Ruiz did not plead within thirty days from the initial appearance and she did not waive her right to an indictment. The government invested more time and work in preparing Ruiz's case than would have been required if Ruiz had accepted the plea agreement and pled within the time constraints, even without the impeachment waiver.

The very purpose of the fast track downward departure is to expedite the plea process and dramatically reduce the workload of the federal prosecutors, public defenders, and the district court. In exchange for expediting the resolution of the District's pending cases, the defendant receives a two-level downward departure at sentencing. Once everyone is required to put more time and effort into the case, as was necessary here, the reason for offering the departure is thwarted. The record supports the conclusion that this is the legitimate reason for the prosecutor's opposition to the downward departure in Ruiz's case ("[W]e [the government] are giving up all the benefits that would normally come with the fast track departure.").

Moreover, the record is devoid of any evidence that Ruiz told the prosecutor at the time of the offer that she was rejecting it because of the impeachment waiver. Nor does the record show that she attempted to negotiate away the waiver but was rebuffed. Such evidence, along with the prosecutor's refusal to move, may have been sufficient to satisfy the "substantial threshold showing" standard, but none was offered. The only evidence in her favor before us is that she was offered the departure and refused it, later pled guilty, and then the prosecutor opposed her motion for the fast track downward departure. That evidence is insufficient to entitle her to a hearing under Khoury.

3. The Distinction Between Unconstitutional Motive and Unconstitutional Waiver.

The majority further complicates matters by mistakenly conflating two distinct constitutional challenges present in this case. It is asserted that, in order to make her claim for unconstitutional motive, Ruiz must show that the impeachment waiver was unconstitutional. But whether Ruiz could or could not waive her rights to the impeachment information is wholly irrelevant to whether the prosecutor acted with an unconstitutional motive at sentencing.

To illustrate this principle, one need only look at the facts in Khoury. 62 F.3d at 1138. The issue there was not whether Khoury could waive his right to trial. He undoubtedly could. Rather the issue was whether the prosecutor acted unconstitutionally by opposing a motion for a downward departure at sentencing solely because Khoury opted to exercise his right to a trial. Id. at 1142. We concluded that a prosecutor cannot act vindictively in refusing to move for a downward departure because a defendant wishes to exercise her constitutional rights. *Id.*³

³ The majority argues that “if the Brady waiver were constitutional, Ruiz would have no basis for arguing that the government withheld the ‘fast track’ recommendation for an unconstitutional reason.” Op. at 2757 n. 7. Ruiz’s basis for arguing that the government acted unconstitutionally in refusing to recommend the fast track departure would be that the prosecutor was punishing Ruiz for exercising her constitutional right to receive impeachment information, whether or not that right is waivable. See Murphy, 65

Likewise in this case, if the problem was really with the prosecutor's actions at the sentencing hearing, then whether Ruiz could or could not waive her right to impeachment information is irrelevant to whether the prosecutor acted with an unconstitutional motive at sentencing. In other words, even if Ruiz could waive her impeachment rights (as Khoury could waive his right to trial), Ruiz might still have a claim for unconstitutional motive against the prosecutor, following the majority's new rule that the "substantial threshold showing" standard applies in fast track departure cases.

The only way to reach the issue of whether impeachment rights are waivable is through a direct challenge to the plea offer, not by challenging the sentence. We do not have jurisdiction on this record to entertain a direct challenge to the waiver.

F.3d at 763 (holding that the defendant was required to present objective evidence that the prosecutor's decision to refuse a § 5K1.1 recommendation was "motivated by a desire to punish him for exercising his [waivable] right to trial"); Khoury, 62 F.3d at 1138 (holding that a prosecutor acts with an unconstitutional motive by refusing to recommend a downward departure in order to punish a defendant for exercising his waivable right to a jury trial).

I do not believe that Ruiz has made a substantial threshold showing that the prosecutor acted with a motive to punish her for exercising her right to receive the undisclosed material, whether or not that right is waivable. The majority disagrees. But the majority, by further holding that Ruiz cannot waive her right to receive what it mistakenly characterizes as Brady information, transforms this case from a minor dispute about the application of firmly established law to a distinct set of facts, to a new constitutional rule that once presumably waivable rights are now unwaivable. This transformation is wholly unnecessary to the resolution of the case and sets a dangerous precedent.

B. Jurisdiction to Review the Impeachment Waiver.

“An unconditional guilty plea constitutes a waiver of the right to appeal all non-jurisdictional antecedent rulings and cures all antecedent constitutional defects.” United States v. Floyd, 108 F.3d 202, 204 (9th Cir. 1997) (emphasis in original). The Supreme Court has made it clear that a defendant, after admitting in open court that she is guilty, may not raise a claim that her constitutional rights were violated before she entered the plea. Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258, 267, 93 S. Ct. 1602, 36 L.Ed.2d 235 (1973). She may challenge her plea only by demonstrating that it was not made voluntarily and intelligently. Id. She may do this by showing that her counsel was ineffective in giving her advice regarding the guilty plea, id., or by demonstrating that her plea was made without the benefit of Brady material that the prosecution deliberately withheld without her knowledge. See Sanchez v. United States, 50 F.3d 1448, 1453 (9th Cir. 1995).

The Court in Tollett made it clear that the primary inquiry is whether the plea was entered into voluntarily and intelligently. Tollett, 411 U.S. at 266, 93 S. Ct. 1602. Even if the alleged unconstitutionality was unknown to the defendant at the time she entered the unconditional plea, she is not entitled to appellate review unless she can make a showing that the plea was not made voluntarily or intelligently. Id.

The only way for Ruiz to challenge the impeachment waiver is by challenging her plea. And she can only challenge her plea by demonstrating that it was not made voluntarily or intelligently—that is, by demonstrating (1) that she made the plea without the benefit of the impeachment material and (2) that the impeachment material would have affected her decision to plead guilty. See Sanchez, 50 F.3d at 1453-54. But she did not accept the government's plea offer. She has never alleged that she did not receive the impeachment material and we may presume in the absence of such an allegation that this information (if it even existed) was not kept from her.

The majority attempts to evade the Tollett rule by characterizing the unconstitutional act as the prosecutor's refusal to move for the downward departure at sentencing. Because the refusal occurred after the plea was entered, the majority argues, the Tollett rule precluding appellate review of antecedent constitutional defects is inapplicable.

As demonstrated in Khoury, however, Ruiz's complaint about the sentence imposed does not depend upon the waivability of her rights to impeachment information. The alleged unconstitutionality of the prosecutor's actions at sentencing are entirely distinct from the alleged unconstitutionality of the impeachment waiver that she never complained of before unconditionally pleading guilty.

Her complaint with regard to the waiver can only be that the prosecutor unconstitutionally conditioned the two-level downward departure on her waiving her unwaivable right to impeachment material. But the prosecutor requested this condition at the time of the plea offer, not at the time of sentencing. The constitutional defect, if any, occurred prior to the entry of the unconditional guilty plea. Thus, the Tollett rule applies, and Ruiz waived any challenge she may have had to the alleged unconstitutional conditioning of the downward departure on the impeachment waiver. Accordingly, we lack jurisdiction to review both Ruiz's sentence and the constitutionality of the impeachment waiver.

III. THE POLICY IMPLICATIONS OF THE NEW RULE.

In addition to the jurisdictional bar to our review, the Court's decision makes little sense from a policy standpoint. The government has an interest in maintaining the confidentiality of government witnesses and protecting ongoing investigations into other drug courier cases. We should not unnecessarily create a new rule that forces the government to turn over information to a defendant immediately upon beginning plea bargain negotiations, when that information will generally be of little use to the defendant unless she goes to trial. This disclosure is especially problematic when the release of the information could have detrimental consequences in future criminal proceedings, as it would, for example, if the government were required to publicly release information on the identity of an informant that it would like to keep confidential for as long as possible.

Perhaps most importantly, the majority's decision jeopardizes the fast track program, which, to this point, has been a highly successful way of resolving, prior to indictment, these types of cases in the Southern District of California. Through the fast track program the District has been able to dramatically expedite the processing of its heavy workload⁴ by encouraging de-defendants in simple cases like this to plead very early in the process, waive indictment, and promise not to file any motions other than sentencing memoranda.

By also asking a defendant to waive her right to impeachment information, the prosecution can save itself from the often time-consuming process of determining which witnesses it may call at trial, what potential impeachment information on each witness is in its possession, and whether it must disclose that information to the defendant. This time-saving aspect is one of the reasons underlying the Jencks Act. 18 U.S.C. § 3500.

Because the majority holds the impeachment waiver unconstitutional, despite the fact that it lacks jurisdiction to do so, it dramatically reduces the efficacy of the fast track program. The government no longer has an incentive to offer the departure if the plea agreement does not significantly reduce the District's workload. Thus, the majority's new rule delays the efficient handling of cases that should be disposed of promptly to the benefit of everyone.

IV. CONCLUSION.

We lack jurisdiction to review Ruiz's sentence. More importantly, we lack jurisdiction to issue an unprecedented rule that defendants may not waive their rights to impeachment material. This brand new rule harms the administration of justice. I respectfully dissent.

ANGELA RUIZ, DEFENDANT-APPELLANT

[Filed: June 11, 2001]

ORDER

Before: BOOCHEVER, TASHIMA, and TALLMAN,
Circuit Judges.

Judges Boochever and Tashima have voted to deny the petition for rehearing. Judge Tashima has voted to deny the petition for rehearing en banc and Judge Boochever so recommends. Judge Tallman has voted to grant the petition for rehearing and the petition for rehearing en banc.

The full court has been advised of the petition for rehearing en banc and no active judge has requested a vote on whether to rehear the matter en banc. Fed. R. App. P. 35.

The petition for rehearing and rehearing en banc are DENIED.

Case No. 99CR2604-T

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF

v.

ANGELA RUIZ, DEFENDANT

[Monday, Jan. 10, 2000, 9:00 a.m.]

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE HONORABLE HOWARD B. TURRENTINE
UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

* * * * *

MR. BRITT: * * * * *

I filed two departures. One is the fast track departure. Ms. Ruiz did not file any motion. She did everything that someone in her position would normally do but for the disagreement over the language in the standard plea agreement.

* * * * *

MR. MILLER: * * * * *

The Government opposes any further departure. Fast track is an exchange for some benefits to the Government because they may have some idea that something is unconstitutional in our plea agreement. We disagree with that greatly, and we are giving up all the benefits that would normally come with the fast track departure.

Furthermore, it seems that she only pled guilty after she was docketed on her OSC for her dirty test. She did this out of financial consideration, for financial consideration to buy drugs. And her positive test for cocaine and PCP should be an aggravated factor that should justify no departure.

* * * * *

MR. BRITT: Your Honor, with regard to the fast track, just briefly. Ms. Ruiz is in a position where she'd be willing to waive her appellate rights. As was mentioned in the sentencing memo, the real issue is with regard to the constitutionality of waiving Brady and Giglio. It had nothing to do with an appellate waiver.

THE COURT: Counsel, isn't your plea bargain a matter of contract that's an offer and acceptance?

MR. BRITT: It is, your Honor.

THE COURT: And if you don't accept it, that's a decision you have to make. And if you do, the Government is bound by it.

MR. BRITT: Well, your Honor, that's true, but in a sense, it is still a request for a departure when it comes time for sentencing.

THE COURT: Of course, the client doesn't have to plead guilty, you know.

MR. BRITT: I understand that as well, your Honor. The real issue is the constitutionality of the Brady and the Giglio waiver. She stands before the Court, and as you can see from the letter that was also—I believe there was a letter submitted that your Honor received that—that was the only—that was the issue that she was challenging with respect to the plea agreement. She didn't have a problem of waiving her right to appeal. The real issue was the Brady, Giglio waiver.

And again, it's—the fast track is a departure which the Court—even if we showed up on the day of sentencing and it was in the agreement, the Court could still say, under 5(k)(2.0), I'm not going to grant a departure. There's no question about that.

THE COURT: That's absolutely right, Counsel. I'm not bound by it.

MR. BRITT: That's exactly right. And that's why we're asking the Court to—

THE COURT: Anything further?

MR. BRITT: Nothing further.

THE COURT: The Court has read and considered the presentence report, the sentencing documents filed on behalf of the Defendant, and the Court finds that the base level of the offense is 18. She gets a credit for minor role of two and acceptance of three, which gives us a 13 over three for sentencing purposes, which provides for an 18 to a 24-month sentence.

I note that probation in the report recommends 21 months and $500 for her addiction drug belief. Therefore—and the Court feels that this is not a proper case for any departures except for provided for by the regular sentencing procedures. That is a minor role or the role of the Defendant and the acceptance.

And therefore, it's judged the Defendant be committed to the custody of Bureau of Prisons for imprisonment for a term of 18 months. The Court recommends she be given all possible treatment for her drug addiction.

Upon her release, she shall be subject to a three-year term of supervised release, the usual terms and conditions. In addition, she shall not possess firearms, shall submit to search and seizure of her person or personal effects, her home and her automobile on the demand of the supervising officer and shall be subject to drug testing if deemed necessary by the supervising officer during the term of her supervised release.

*, DEFENDANT

PLEA AGREEMENT

IT IS HEREBY AGREED between the plaintiff, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, through its counsel, Gregory A. Vega, United States Attorney, and XXXXXX X. V.

INFORMATION

The Government represents that any information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant known to the undersigned prosecutor in this case has been turned over to the defendant. The Government understands it has a continuing duty to provide such information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant.

The defendant understands that if this case proceeded to trial, the Government would be required to provide impeachment information relating to any informants or other witnesses. In addition, if the defendant raised an affirmative defense, the Government would be required to provide information in its possession that supports such a defense. In return for the Government's promises set forth in this agreement, the defendant waives the right to this information, and agrees not to attempt to withdraw the guilty plea or to file a collateral attack based on the existence of this information.
